May I cite to you something of the overcharge, as shown by a speech delivered by Hon. JOHN RANKIN, Representative from Mississippi? The people of the State of Delaware, the District of Columbia, the States of Maryland and West Virginia together used 2,119,605,000 kilowatt-hours of electric energy last year, for which they paid the sum of $52,659,441. Under the T. V. A. rates the cost would have been $27,789,441, or a saving of $24,870,000 a year. Still they maintain their love for the people of my State and their love for the investors and their love for the consumers.

We in the State of West Virginia pay $2 for every 25 kilowatt-hours of electricity used. Under the T. V. A. rates we would pay 75 cents. For 50 kilowatt-hours we would pay $3 or $3.25, depending on two systems, while under the T. V. A. rate we would pay $1.50. In other words, every man or woman—including widows—no matter how poor, when he or she goes up to pay his electric bill, pays $1.50 or $1.65 tribute to the Power Trust and to the holding companies which have hidden and dodged and escaped regulation and are going to continue to endeavor to escape regulation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from West Virginia yield?

Mr. HOLT. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator a moment ago stated that the people of West Virginia pay $3,500,000 overcharge in rates. How does that compare with the annual income of the State government, exclusive of any taxes from gasoline for road purposes?

Mr. HOLT. The annual expenditure of the State of West Virginia amounts to $52,000,000, including gasoline taxes. If we applied the T. V. A. saving in West Virginia to taxes we would have but $48,000,000 to pay. I will go further and say that if we could have contributed the amount of money that the investors of the State of West Virginia have lost in utility stocks upon the basis of per capita cost, we should not need to have any property tax in the State of West Virginia for 9 years. Our entire property tax is only $27,000,000, and on the per capita basis $234,000,000 was lost by West Virginia investors in 4 years in these top holding companies. It is absurd to say that the people of the State of West Virginia want a continuation of that. I say the people of the State of West Virginia want the lobby of the Power Trust driven into the open. They want the holding companies eliminated, so that we can get fair and equitable rates for gas and electricity. We want to go back to democratic government, where the utilities do not control officials.

I think this bill is important in other respects other than the financial one. I think it is important for one particular reason other than the matter of dollars and cents. It is a means by which the utilities will be driven out of politics. If the utilities can be driven out of politics, we shall drive out of politics the worst menace the American Government has today, because they corrupt behind closed doors, not on the street corners. They corrupt in hotel rooms and in star-chamber sessions.

As I see the matter it is the duty of the United States Senate and the duty of the Congress of the United States to eliminate the utilities from the game of politics and give the American people at least a break and an opportunity for fair and equitable rates not only for the benefit of the rate payers but also for the protection of the investors of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I am advised that in all probability a print of the utilities bill will be necessary, or at least convenient, to the members of the conference. Therefore, I ask the adoption of the order which I send to the desk, if it meets with the approval of the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed order will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That the bill S. 2796, the Public Utility Act of 1935, be printed showing the House amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the order is entered.

STRENGTH AND DISTRIBUTION OF LINE OF NAVY—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. TRAMMELL. I submit a conference report on House bill 5599, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5599) to regulate the strength and distribution of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagrement to the first amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 9. The last proviso of the appropriation 'Pay of the Navy', contained in the Naval Appropriation Act for the fiscal year 1897, approved June 10, 1896 (29 Stat., 361), is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'And provided further, That hereafter no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any officer in the Navy or Marine Corps on the active list while such officer is employed, after June 30, 1897, by any person or company furnishing naval supplies or war materials to the Government and such employment is hereby made unlawful after said date: Provided, That no payment shall be made from appropriations made by Congress to any retired officer in the Navy or Marine Corps who for himself or for others is engaged in the selling of, contracting for the sale of, or negotiating for the sale of, to the Navy or the Navy Department, any naval supplies or war material.'"

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

PARK TRAMMELL,
DAVID I. WALSH,
FREDERICK HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

CARL VINSON,
P. H. DREWRY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the report?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question. Is this the bill which contains the amendment in which I was interested?

Mr. TRAMMELL. This is the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. And the amendment has been included in the bill?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment has been included in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I thank the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the report?

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, unless some Senator desires to continue the discussion of the bill, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair) laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting several judicial nominations to the courts of the District of Columbia, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

[For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.]

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

NOMINATION PASSED OVER—POSTMASTER

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no further reports of committees, the clerk will state the first nomination in order on the calendar.

The legislative clerk read the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla.

Mr. McKELLAR. On behalf of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], I ask that that nomination be again passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The nomination will be passed over.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask that the remaining nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the remaining nominations of postmasters are confirmed en bloc.

IN THE ARMY

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations in the Army.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I ask that the Army nominations be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 10, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, JULY 9, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Once more, our Heavenly Father, we are brought face to face with the duties of another day. Thou, who art the inspiration of the good, the beautiful, and the true, we thank Thee for the glory of life, for the power of choice, for the joy of serving, and for the courage of sacrifice. Be Thou the source of our longings, our hopes, and our aspirations. Kindle in all our hearts a sacred flame, which shall burn brighter and brighter as time comes and goes, and Thine shall be the glory forever. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON PATENTS

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution (H. Res. 265) from the Committee on Accounts.

House Resolution 265

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the hearings authorized by House Resolution 196, incurred by the Committee on Patents, acting as a whole or by a subcommittee, not to exceed $25,000, including expenditures for the employment of experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House on vouchers authorized by such committee, or by any subcommittee thereof conducting such hearings, signed by the chairman of the committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

SEC. 2. That the official committee reporters shall serve said committee or subcommittee at its meetings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. SNELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a pretty large appropriation, and I think the Chairman of the Committee on Patents should make some explanation.

The SPEAKER. There is a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: In line 4, strike out "$25,000" and insert "$15,000."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I think even now the Chairman of the Committee on Patents, Dr. SIROVICH, should make a little explanation about that. That is a pretty large appropriation.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the Chairman of the Committee on Patents [Mr. SIROVICH] 5 minutes.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Speaker, among the brilliant, eminent, and distinguished men who were delegates to the Constitutional Convention in 1787 that wrote the Constitution of the United States was the great scholar, philosopher, and sage, Benjamin Franklin. Being an author, scientist, and inventor, Benjamin Franklin was responsible for writing into the Constitution article I, section 8, paragraph 8, which states:

Congress shall have the power to promote the useful arts and sciences by securing to every author and to every inventor for a limited number of years the exclusive right to his writings and to his discoveries.

That philosophic sentiment was the practical and concrete contribution of Benjamin Franklin on the altar of materialism to aid those who dedicate their lives to science, literature, and art.

The first three Commissioners to look after patents when our Government was founded were George Washington, President; Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State; and Edmund Randolph, Attorney General of the United States.

From 1789 to 1935 2,000,000 patents have been issued by the Patent Office of our country.

Mr. SNELL. We appreciate all that. Let us get right down to the facts before us and what is necessary to be done that requires the expenditure of $15,000. Every man here knows all about the constitutional provision.

Mr. SIROVICH. I thought these facts I have enumerated would be pertinent and illuminating to the Members of Congress. However, I shall come to the point.

For the past 5 years, since I have been Chairman of the Committee on Patents, our committee has had innumerable complaints from business, commercial, and industrial enterprises, protesting against many iniquitous abuses that permeate the field of invention. In the vernacular of the street, many rackets have developed in the pooling of patents that have made it impossible for the inventor, the merchant, the manufacturer, and the industrialist to attend to his business and to take advantage of the opportunities that Congress intended when it granted a monopoly for 17 years for the issuing of a patent to promote the arts and sciences. To eliminate these tragic influences in patents, H. R. 4523 was introduced, which provides for the recording of patent-pooling agreements and contracts with the Commissioner of Patents. This bill further provides that every agreement by which rights in a plurality of patented inventions are rendered subject to common ownership, control, or enjoyment, whether by assignment, license, or otherwise, together with all agreements predicated thereon which affect the terms and conditions under which one or more of the said patented inventions may be manufactured, used, sold, leased, or licensed, shall be recorded in the Patent Office within 6 months from the date thereof.

This bill also provides if complaints against the pooling of patents are filed with the Commissioner of Patents, or if any of the agreements herein specified are against the public interest or the public welfare, or if in the judgment of the Commissioner of Patents such agreements are against the public interest or the public welfare, or at the request of the Chairman or a member of the Federal Trade Commission, the Commissioner of Patents shall file a certified copy of such agreement or agreements or notice of failure to file such agreement or agreements with the Federal Trade Commission for such action as the Federal Trade Commission may deem necessary to protect the public interest and the public welfare and prevent unwarranted monopoly.

Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Patents has unanimously voted to investigate the serious charges that have been made against many people in different lines of endeavor that have exploited business and industry for their own selfish advantage and to the detriment of the consuming public.

The House passed a resolution permitting the Committee on Patents to subpena witnesses in order to seek information that might help us report out a bill that would bring justice to the great commercial and industrial enterprises of our country as well as to the inventor and consuming public. These people have refused to come. The Committee on Accounts unanimously voted to appropriate the sum of $15,000, which would help the Committee on Patents as a whole, or through a subcommittee, to investigate this matter and bring forth a measure that would be instrumental in eliminating and abolishing these rackets and abuses that come from the pooling of patents or the cross licensing of patents.

It might interest the Membership of the House to state the purposes of this bill have the sympathetic and enthusiastic approval and commendation of the genial, gracious, and beloved Secretary of Commerce, Daniel Roper.

Mr. SNELL. Now, if you already know what the conditions are, why can you not bring in the legislation without an investigation?

Mr. SIROVICH. Should we enact the present bill before our committee with the serious charges that have been made against various individuals, it might be instrumental in bringing forth an obnoxious measure that might inadvertently and unconsciously harm many business interests and inventors.

The committee, after considering all these factors, unanimously decided—Democrats, Republicans, and Farm-Laborites—that it would be far better to ascertain what the great industrial, commercial, and manufacturing enterprises throughout the country have to contend with, to listen to their complaints, and to bring in a bill that would be designed once and for all to abolish these nefarious practices that have exploited our productive enterprises, harmed the creative talent of our country, such as our inventors, and enriched a group of racketeers that have been thriving as leeches upon industry throughout the Nation.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, we are getting so many of these investigating committees going this summer that we may have to get some new Members of Congress, as there will not be enough to serve on them.

Mr. STARNES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs upon the adoption of the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PRIVATE PROFIT OR PUBLIC SERVICE, WHICH?—THE HOLDING COMPANIES AND PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. COLDEN. Mr. Speaker, the Wheeler-Rayburn bill for the regulation of holding companies and the elimination of the useless and vicious corporations has provoked a bitter controversy. During my presence in Congress I have not noted such a tense feeling, such keen debate, and such a sharp struggle as we have witnessed the past few days. The very atmosphere of the House indicates an issue of utmost importance. Not only is the issue of unusual significance but the fact that President Roosevelt himself has championed the passage of this bill adds to the tenseness of the situation. Probably in no congressional contest of the Nation has the issue been so clearly cut as between the power of corporate wealth, as against the economic welfare of the common people, as in this instance. On one side are the billions of organized and ruthless wealth arrayed against the millions of investors who have purchased unsound securities, and the millions of consumers, who are the victims of a "plunderbund" not equalled in American annals.

ARTFUL LOBBYISTS AND THE "DEATH SENTENCE"

The holding companies have been supported by a superlobby, such as Washington has rarely witnessed. Those who have profited by these great holding companies have flocked to Washington by the hundreds. The crafty holding companies have chosen as their representatives shrewd and able attorneys and clever politicians. Every trick of statecraft, every art of propaganda, every power that can influence has been exerted to aid in the tremendous struggle against the President and his program. Catch words and catch phrases have been used in this bitter campaign. The phrase "death sentence" has been injected into the campaign and has been bandied about by the newspapers and has echoed and reechoed on the floor, in the committee rooms, and the corridors. The "death sentence" is a phrase of deception in that it conveys the inference that the President's program has for its purpose death and destruction.

A DUST STORM OF DECEIT

The opposition to the administration has hurled ugly and sizzling words at the President for lobbying. The holding companies turned a word of reproach against the President's program. "Lobby", "lobbying", and "lobbyists", used in reproach, are words applied to those who seek their goals by insidious routes and invidious methods. Because a few administration officials were delegated to draw the first draft of the holding-company bill and were consulted by some of the Members of Congress, and, in some instances, upon the request of those studying the problem, the President and his advisers are dragged down into the gutter of cheap politics. This illustrates the desperate straits of the Power Trust and the power of propaganda that spreads like a dust storm and obscures the real objects in the picture.

PHILANDERERS WHO PROSTITUTE PUBLIC HONOR

One of the high-powered artists of a gang of "brain stormers", who would defeat the President in his fight for decent business, decent operation of utilities, and decent treatment of the investors and consumers of power and light, has the brazen effrontery to viciously attack the President in order to throw a smoke screen over the activities of one of the most nefarious lobbies that has ever infected and contaminated the corridors of the Capitol. This high mogul of insidious propaganda would have the public believe that the President has sent his "minions who buttonhole Congressmen and with threats and promises seek to induce them to vote for the 'death sentence.'" This prostitute of public honor, this parasite of privilege, this puppet of insidious power, has the unadulterated audacity to use such phrases as "Would-be Caesar in the White House" and "We thank God for those brave Democrats of the House who have dared * * * to defy the unjust and autocratic usurpation of the President." Such are the intemperate and vicious screeds uttered by the puppets of the Power Trust to defame the leader in the White House, who has the courage and the patriotism to throttle the glorified thieves, the pampered pirates, the gilt-edged buccaneers who have roamed the highways and byways, and, worse than freebooters of old, have not spared the aged, the widow, nor the orphan. These are the wolves in sheep's clothing that cry, "Caesar, Caesar", and in pious accents "thank God" and pray from the housetops in dulcet tones for "the widow and the orphan" and then cash their pay checks from the polluted profits of the Power Trust. These insidious puppets defend their masters who not only swindled the investors but who robbed the consumer and then increased their own unearned and extortionate salaries in the face of homeless men, penniless women, and unprotected orphans. Now when justice is on the trail of these hypocrites, these fatted and pampered philanderers who prostitute public honor, they cry, "Wolf, wolf", "Caesar, Caesar", at those whom they would destroy.

THE REAL PURPOSE IS TO PROTECT

My own observation is that the Members of the House and of the Senate, who are honestly supporting the President's program, desire to preserve every sound investment made by the people of this country in good faith. The real purpose of those backing the administration bill is to prevent predatory wealth from robbing investors of savings with one hand and robbing the consumers of the public-utility companies with the other.

It is possible that a holding company by the purchase of several contiguous companies may be able to consolidate the management and the organization and economize in the operation in such a way as to secure the investor and to protect the consumer. The Wheeler-Rayburn bill protects these legitimate objectives. On the contrary, we have few holding companies of this character, but many gigantic corporations sprawling over the country that have pursued a course of reckless profiteering, criminal manipulation, and brought disaster to the investor and to the consumer.

CHAIRMAN RAYBURN SUBMITS EVIDENCE

Permit me to refer to some of the facts and figures submitted by the Honorable SAM RAYBURN, Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in his opening address in the discussion of this bill. One of the abuses of the holding-company system is the writing up of the capitalization of the operating company and putting these bookkeeping and racketeering profits in their own pockets. An example is given of an electric power and light corporation organized in 1925 as a subsidiary of the Electric Bond & Share group, which acquired operating companies in Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi for more than $70.000,000.

These properties were listed by the former companies at about $42,000,000, and in this write-up the holding-company racketeers made a profit of about $28,000,000. These profits were realized by selling these blue-sky bonds and stocks to widows and orphans, teachers, preachers, doctors, and mechanics, in whom they now express such a deep and profound interest. The Appalachian Power Co. made a profit of over $66,000,000 in a single write-up. A Minnesota corporation wrote up its purchase with a profit of over $21,000,000, or 126 percent. Down in Florida, by the same procedure, a holding company manipulated a write-up of over $30,000,000 profit, or 103 percent.

Down in Texas, the Electric Bond & Share Co. purchased the electric and gas plants in several of the small and prosperous cities of Texas, and capitalized these companies at an excess of over $8,000,000, or a profit of 400 percent.

HERE'S THE WAY YOUR MONEY GOES

The Cities Service Power & Light Co. is another one of the great corporations guilty of this greedy practice. In one transaction it increased the capitalization of its operating companies more than $6,000,000, or 165 percent profit. The Associated Gas & Electric System is guilty of write-ups of $115,000,000, a clear paper profit, but which was a tremendously added burden to the operating companies, added costs to the consumer, and blue sky or polluted water for the investors.

In these write-ups the custom was to organize a new holding company, take over the former companies by issuing securities, and then unload the enormous profits on the innocent public. This was carried on to an unbelievable extent, in one instance with nine holding companies based upon the operating companies at the bottom of this air-castle structure. In this case, Mr. RAYBURN points out, $1 at the top enables the managers to control over $30,000 of book value of the operating companies, or with less than $50,000 control over a billion dollars of book value. In another set-up by an investment of about $23,000 at the top of the pyramid $1,200,000,000 was controlled at the bottom.

GREEDY MIDAS AND CAPTAIN KIDD

In all the history of brigands, buccaneers, and pirates, no examples of plundering depredation can equal these methods of wringing from the investors and consumers profits beyond the dreams of Midas plus the greedy gains of the followers of the Golden Calf throughout all previous ages. Captain Kidd, the terrible pirate, in all his bloody glory took his life in his hands when he robbed his fellow men and gave his victims at least a chance to battle for their possessions; but under our system of the modern holding company, the buccaneer sits in his luxurious office and, by insidious methods, advertisements, and slick salesmen, unloads his worthless watered stocks on an innocent public and rakes in millions and billions of unearned increment and tainted wealth without risking a spot of his hide or a single hair of his rapacious and avaricious head.

OTHER METHODS OF MILKING THE PUBLIC

And this is but one of the abuses of the holding company. In addition to wringing these racketeering profits from the savings of the public, the holding companies have organized legal departments by which the local operating company must pay extortionate and unearned fees for legal advice, must purchase their supplies from agencies of the holding company without competition and at prices that afford enormous profits to the holding-company agents, a part of the system.

Another favorite blood-sucking practice is to loan money to the operating companies at a rate of interest above the current rate and thereby increase the profits of the holding company. Mr. RAYBURN gives example of the subsidiaries of the Associated Gas & Electric Co., which turned all of their money into the holding company and could not draw it out unless the holding company countersigned the checks. The subsidiaries and operating companies were then charged interest at the rate of 8 percent per annum, compounded monthly, on such advances as were made by the holding company to the operating companies.

A HOUSE OF CARDS MUST FALL

It is very evident that the holding companies, by such outrageous methods, must in course of time fall from their own rottenness, and the investors suffer accordingly. That time came in the debacle of 1929. That crash of superficial and artificial prosperity squeezed the water out of these superstructures sprawled all over the Nation, and their slime and naked assets stood out like the grim trunks of a colorful tree after a battle of the World War. American Gas & Electric Co. stock dropped from $203.90 per share to $3.75; American Power & Light Co. from $171.50 per share to 75 cents; American Water Works & Electrical Co. from $186.25 to $1.35; Columbia Gas & Electric Corporation from $129 to $4.35; Commonwealth & Southern from $30.15 to 50 cents; Electric Bond & Share Co. from $177.50 to $4.10 per share; Middlewest Utilities Co. from $49.90 to nothing. These are only a few quotations from the table submitted by Mr. RAYBURN, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on page 10320, June 27, 1935. This table shows the ruin from the house of hot air and subterfuge and misrepresentation that the holding companies brought down with themselves. It should be noted that any operating company in any substantial city in the land that was operated upon a business basis, free from the tangled web of holding-company control, was able to sustain the crisis and protect its investors to a much better advantage. It should also be emphasized that all investments in Government and publicly owned enterprises in the utility field did not lose a penny or lose a dividend.

STRIPPING THE OPERATING COMPANIES

Another method of milking the operating companies was a device of organizing construction companies by which the operating company was compelled to pay a profit to the overhead organization. The holding companies also in some instances charged the cost of holding company management to the operating companies. Another favored process was to organize equipment and appliance sales as a part of the holding-company operation, and thus deprive the local operating company of the sales and profits of gas stoves, equipment, and all kinds and sorts of electrical appliances. Thus the local operating companies were stripped and deprived of a rightful field of activity and a source of profit in order to further fill the overflowing pockets of the holding company.

DEFY LAW AND BEAT TAXES

Not only have the super holding companies milked the local and operative companies in devious and various manner, but they have also defied supervision and control by the city, the county, or the State in which they operate. Some holding companies have also used a system of consolidated income-tax returns and thereby cheated the Government of large amounts of income taxes. According to Mr. RAYBURN, one holding company collected $514,000 income tax from the subsidiary companies and pocketed the full amount, thus cheating the Government of a rightful and legal income.

Mr. RAYBURN further states that in 1927 the Electric Bond & Share Co. assessed its operating companies over $9,000,000 for supervision and for performing services. The total expense incurred by the Electric Bond & Share Co. in rendering these services was something over $4,000,000, thereby giving a profit to the Electric Bond & Share Co. of nearly $5,000,000, or a rate of profit of 113 percent. In 1931 this same company received over $11,000,000 for management services to its subsidiary operating companies and made a profit of 103 percent.

HOLDING COMPANIES MUST BE CURBED

In reviewing this sordid and greedy story of manipulation, profiteering, and racketeering, I can find little evidence in behalf of the argument for the continuance of holding companies. The numerous examples of their preying upon the public causes one to pause and wonder why such invisible sprawling predatory interests are permitted to exist. The holding-company system is the fruit of rugged individualism and that school of philosophy that preaches the doctrine of the privileged few and disregards the economic rights of the many. If life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness is to be recognized as a fundamental doctrine in our governmental policies, it seems absolutely necessary to curtail such predatory practices and at once restore protection and security to the people who produce its wealth, who maintain its integrity, and who offer their life and limb in case of war or necessity.

It seems necessary not only to curtail such ruthless corporation but there should be regulation devised by which all corporations doing an interstate business should be licensed by the Federal Government and be compelled to divest themselves of the unfair and swindling practices that have been in vogue the past few years.

INSIDIOUS PROPAGANDA

It is high time the average citizen be made aware of the insidious holding corporations that are preying and feasting upon his savings and his earnings. The propaganda of the great holding companies has been used to poison the newspapers, magazines, colleges, and schools throughout the country. One story is current on the floor of the House that a professor who was receiving a salary of $5,000 per year from the educational institution with which he was identified was receiving $10,000 from the Power Trust in order that he might poison the minds of the young men and women of the institution as well as in other contacts with the public. Examples were cited on the floor of the change in the language of school books at the dictation of the Power Trust. Even pastors have been dominated in their pulpits, club speakers have poured out the poison in numerous clubs, and the same propaganda has been poured out from the platform. Candidates have been financed for public office, city councils have been corrupted, judges and governors have bowed their knees to this tremendous and baneful influence. The pastor and the publicist who has the courage to face these ruthless practices deserves the commendation of his fellowmen regardless of party and creed.

THE CRY AGAINST PUBLIC OWNERSHIP

Numerous opponents of the holding-company bill have thrown up their hands in false alarm and shouted that the bill for the control and elimination of holding companies was a step toward public ownership. The cry has been raised that public ownership is a bugaboo, some ghoul of the night whose mission was to devour and destroy. My own conclusion, from what I have witnessed in the struggle on the floor of the House, is that this discussion will have more weight in educating the public to the necessity of public ownership than it will be effective in the control of holding companies. I believe that the average citizen in reading this alarming story of the reign of predatory buccaneering will be forced to the conclusion that the most reasonable way out of the situation is for each city and community to own and to operate its own utilities.

I was very much interested in the statement of Representative FOCHT, of Pennsylvania, who referred to Mifflinburg, in his district, in which he pointed out that this little city, which owns its water and light plants, paid the entire city taxes from this source of revenue. While I do not believe that the users of water, light, and power should be burdened with the load of taxes of a community, I do believe that this and other examples of a similar kind point out the huge profits that are wrung from nearly every community served by private companies. These examples will prompt these communities to free themselves from the extortionate profits of the private utilities.

A SOURCE OF CITY CORRUPTION

Much of the sordid and scurvy municipal corruption of our cities is based upon the purchase and intimidation of city officials in the ruthless methods used by private utility companies to secure franchises.

Why should there be such a beating of drums and the raising of black flags against public ownership? Why these vicious thrusts at the T. V. A. and the efforts of the administration to free the public from economic bondage? Why should not communities own the water and the light and the power and the gas and the transportation and even the telephones, all of which are so necessary to human activity and comfort. Why should not each community own these utilities and operate them for use and for service and not for profit? The first purpose in the public ownership of utilities is to give the public service, but the first purpose of every private utility is merely profit. Numerous examples can be found of unfit water and inadequate service rendered to cities, because of the greed of the utility operators and owners. Municipal ownership first became generally recognized in the effort of cities to own their water supplies in order to obtain better water, better service, and at a cost within the reach of the poorest consumer.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP IN LOS ANGELES

In referring to public ownership, I desire to call the attention of the municipal ownership program of the city of Los Angeles. It is a romantic story. In the early days of Los Angeles, beginning in 1781, the water supply came from the small stream known as the "Los Angeles River." An Indian woman with an earthen jar balanced upon her head constituted the primitive system of water distribution. In later years the water cart, with a single barrel, succeeded the earthen jar. Then came the water ditch under community ownership, and in 1865 the town council leased the stream to a private operator. In 1898, when the city tried to regain its water system, it was forced to purchase the distributing lines and equipment at a cost of $2,000,000. The first result of the restoration of municipal ownership was a 63-percent reduction in domestic rates. The city was growing at a rapid rate, and the Los Angeles River was estimated under normal conditions of supplying the needs of 250,000 people.

BRINGING WATER 250 MILES

The pioneers of modern Los Angeles, with a marvelous vision, developed a program to bring water from 250 miles northward from the Owens River Valley, across rugged mountains and the burning sands of the Mojave Desert. The result was that the city undertook to build an aqueduct 250 miles in length, at a cost of $25,000,000. These bonds were voted by the bungalow owners of the city of Los Angeles. The scheme was considered visionary by the financiers of that day, but it was a dream that came true, and Los Angeles was supplied with pure water from the mountain tops sufficient to supply the needs of 2,000,000 people. Necessity forced the program of municipal ownership, which has proved such a boon to the people of Los Angeles, who now enjoy a bountiful supply of mountain water at a cost of 13 cents per 100 cubic feet, as compared to an average of 18 cents charged in 183 of the largest cities of the United States. Because of this low rate the average consumption of water in Los Angeles is 130 gallons per day per person, and because of the large area of the city, approximately 450 square miles, the cost of distribution is much higher than the cost in other cities. Municipal ownership has not only assured Los Angeles a bountiful supply of mountain water, so necessary to the health of a great city, but it has furnished it at a minimum cost to the consumer. So sincere is the faith of the bungalow owners of Los Angeles that projects are already well under way to bring power and water from Boulder Dam to provide for a population of millions more.

PAYING ITS WAY

The municipal water bureau of Los Angeles now has assets approximating $150,000,000, with bonds outstanding of about seventy-one millions, leaving an equity built up from earnings of nearly seventy-nine millions. The gross income exceeds nine million annually, and the net income for the year ending June 30, 1933, was in excess of $1,000,000, and for 1934 over $1,335,000.

POWER AND LIGHT IN LOS ANGELES

Since the source of the Owens River aqueduct has a drop of about 3,000 feet before it is distributed in the city of Los Angeles, the cheap production of electricity, or white coal, was early contemplated by the pioneers who built the aqueduct.

The result of the municipal ownership of power and light in Los Angeles has been as marvelous in its operation and its results as was the building of the aqueduct itself. At the present time the municipal bureau of power and light of Los Angeles has assets of approximately $96,000,000. The outstanding bonds are approximately $38,000,000, leaving net assets of more than $50,000,000 built out of the earnings of municipal ownership of power and light.

REDUCED THE COST AND MADE MONEY

The municipal department of light and power in Los Angeles began operations in 1916. In a period of 16 years the consumption of light and power has increased eight times greater than in the beginning. Its revenues have grown from less than $1,000,000 annually to more than $15,000,000. Out of the accumulated profits nearly $44,000,000 have been invested in improvements and expansion. In addition the city power and light bureau has repeatedly reduced the price of light and power to the consumer and has forced competing companies to do likewise, and has saved the consumers $70,000,000 since it began operation.

PROTECT THE INVESTOR

In contrast to the investors in the holding companies in private utilities, who have lost billions of dollars, the investors in the bonds of the municipal light and power plant of Los Angeles hold securities that have not depreciated; that are worth dollar for dollar in spite of the depression, and the owners have never missed a dividend from these investments. In addition to the protection to the investor with the soundest of investments and the saving to the consumer, the municipal light and power plant of Los Angeles has not discharged an employee nor cut wages because of these years of travail and despair.

FOUGHT BY RIVAL UTILITIES

The development of this municipal program at Los Angeles, particularly of light and power, has been a battle from the beginning to the end. Private utility companies have maintained lobbies, not only in Los Angeles city hall but in the State legislature at Sacramento, for the purpose of handicapping and hamstringing the city-owned utility at every opportunity. If I recall the figures correctly, the testimony was taken before the State Railway Commission of California that showed that opposing companies in Los Angeles had spent over $160,000 for the purpose of defeating a single city bond issue for expanding and improving the city plant. Paid propaganda is poured out through the newspapers, chamber of commerce officials are said to be frequently subsidized, and fluent orators speak deceptive phrases from the platform. So complete is the system that beautifully gowned and clever women flit from club to club and from tea to tea to spread the subtle doctrines of the power "plunderbund." Every city election has been a struggle between the private power interests and the city bureau, and in many city elections the private power interests employ hundreds of precinct workers, who carry on insidious campaigns, trailing up and down the sidewalks, pushing the bells of every door, in order to inveigle the unwary voter to cast his ballot against his own investment in the city power plant in order that the private companies may restore their stranglehold on the throat of the consumer.

CONTRIBUTION TO CITY BUDGET

Time and again the statement has been hurled across the floor of the House that publicly owned utilities pay no taxes. I wish to call this fact to the attention of my colleagues. According to the official bulletin of department of water and power of Los Angeles in the first 7 months of the fiscal year, beginning July 1, 1934, $1,519,967 has been turned over to Los Angeles and its citizens through voluntary action of the municipal department of water and power. Of these funds, $90,000 were turned over to aid unemployed women in Los Angeles. Free electricity and water for city services, such as street lighting and fire protection, amounted to $900,000. For the food fund, Parent-Teachers Association, $32,500. For the payment of bonds of the city, $406,467.44. For the community chest, $50,000. For direct relief, $41,000. In face of the distress of the city of Los Angeles financially, the publicly owned water and power plant of the city has been a great contributor, far in excess of the amounts that might be collected from taxation. For the present fiscal year the department of water and power has allocated to the city for the dual purpose of aiding in balancing the budget and to relieve the taxpayer the sum of $2,559,945. Will some of my colleagues, who have been defending the holding companies and decrying public ownership, point out a few examples of benevolence on the part of these far-flung empires of exploitation that will compare with the patriotic acts of the department of water and power in the city of Los Angeles?

WHY FACTORIES COME TO LOS ANGELES

One of the greatest benefits from this public ownership policy in the city of Los Angeles is that our factories enjoy one of the lowest power rates of any of the industrial centers in the Nation. It has been a powerful magnet in drawing light manufacturing from all parts of the country and has made one of the greatest contributions to the growth of southern California.

At the installation of the city power plant, Los Angeles produced $167,000,000 from its factories and industries, but due largely to cheap power, the output is now estimated at one and one-quarter billion dollars per annum. As compared with other cities, the rate for light and power in Los Angeles presents an interesting study. It also illustrates the cheaper rates of a publicly owned utility. These figures are taken from the Federal Power Commission rate survey with rates in effect January 1, 1935.

	For 15 kilowatt-hours	For 100 kilowatt-hours	For 250 kilowatt-hours
Los Angeles, Calif.	$0.72	$3.31	$6.31
Kansas City, Mo.	.98	4.00	7.75
Detroit, Mich.	1.03	3.53	6.90
Chicago, Ill.	1.03	3.75	8.02
Philadelphia, Pa.	1.03	4.45	8.70

So successful has been public ownership in the city of Los Angeles that the city has developed one of the greatest harbors of the world at an expense of an investment of $30,000,000 and which makes a saving of more than $100,000,000 dollars in transportation rates to the city of Los Angeles and the Southwest.

PUBLIC OWNERSHIP THE REMEDY

The experience of my own city of Los Angeles in the public ownership of water, light, and power, and the harbor convinces me that public ownership is the most rational way out of this web of intrigue and greed that has been woven by the strangling superstructure of holding companies. Light and power are absolutely essential to our modern civilization. Why should any such powerful agency, that means so much for the health, comfort, and progress of our civilization, be used as an instrument to profit the few? Why should not this power be dedicated to all for use and service? It is not only essential to city life but it is a friend of the farmer. Its social significance is one of the great factors in our modern life. Thousands of tired farmers' wives and weary farmers have fled from the drudgery of the farm to enjoy the comforts of city life, in which power and light form a major part. When we consider that electricity not only lights our homes and streets but turns the wheels of our factories, is essential to the automobile, the street car, the airplane, the radio, the telephone, the telegraph, and other ways too numerous to mention, we realize its necessity to all.

BENEFITS OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION

One of the greatest needs of this Nation is to promote and to establish rural electrification. Think of the tremendous value of light and power to the farm. It affords a simple method of pumping water, sawing wood, shelling corn, grinding feed, turning grindstones, and other chores. It abolishes the broom, the washboard, the hot stove, the hot irons, the source of the drudgery, and the aches that pain the backs of man, woman, boy, and beast. The additional comforts of the fan and its cooling breeze, the ice and the icebox contribute much to the comfort of life during the hot days on the farm.

Rural electrification means the return of thousands upon thousands from the congested centers of population and a rejuvenated life on the farm that will have a most wholesome effect upon the social structure of American life.

LET'S STAND BY THE PRESIDENT

In my humble opinion, President Roosevelt has never shown greater courage, a deeper friendship for all the people of this country, or a higher order of statesmanship, than in his program to rid this country of the great economic octopus that preys and fattens upon our citizens, that defies and corrupts our city, county, and State governments. As a Member of this Congress, I appreciate this great effort on the part of our President, who is making such a brave challenge to the privileged and unscrupulous few who suck the economic lifeblood of our people.

The battle promises to be long and furious. The enemy is powerful, alert, and insidious. We are engaged in one of the most decisive battles of the economic, social, and political world. We must win in order to free our people from economic servitude.

THE PUBLIC'S INTEREST IN THE BANKING ACT OF 1935

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD to include a radio address made by me on Saturday night on the subject of the Public's Interest in the Banking Act of 1935.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio address delivered by me over N. B. C., blue network, from Washington, D. C., July 6, 1935:

Ladies and gentlemen, I am asked to speak about the public's interest in the Banking Act of 1935. In the brief time at my disposal I will not attempt to do anything more than compare the draft as passed by the House with the draft as reported by the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, adding very briefly a comment on an amendment offered to the House bill during its passage and which will be offered to the Senate bill when it reaches the floor next week.

I think I should say frankly that both the proposed Senate bill and the bill that passed the House are improvements in the public interest over the present law.

Both bills recognize to a certain extent that the currency of the country, that is, the people's medium of exchange, should not be controlled by the banking class; in other words, both bills recognize in part the fact that banking is a private operation, but that the management of the currency of the country is a public function.

Neither the Senate bill nor the House bill entirely divorces the currency from the banking system, but the House bill advances further in this direction than the Senate bill.

For example, the House bill gives to the Federal Reserve Board the right to raise and lower bank reserves. The Senate bill limits the right of the Federal Reserve Board to raise reserves by an average of only 10 percent.

The House bill places the control of rediscount rates in the hands of the Federal Reserve Board; the Senate bill allows the law to remain as it is. The Federal Reserve banks now have the sole power to initiate changes in rediscount rates, subject to confirmation by the Federal Reserve Board.

The House bill provides for an open-market committee consisting of members of the Federal Reserve Board as now constituted, that is, six appointive members and the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency as members ex officio. The Senate bill, which drops the Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency from the Federal Reserve Board and increases the appointive members to seven, provides that the open market committee shall consist of the 7 members of the Federal Reserve Board and 5 governors of the Federal Reserve banks, who are to be annually elected by the 12 governors of the Federal Reserve banks.

The Senate bill requires two members of the Federal Reserve Board to be persons experienced in banking; therefore, the open-market committee under the Senate bill would be required by law to consist of at least 7 bankers out of the 12 members. As the open-market committee is charged with the obligation of regulating the supply of currency by the purchase and sale of Government bonds, it will be seen that the conception of the Senate bill is that the banking class, as a matter of legal right, should have a considerable voice in determining the amount of the people's medium of exchange, and that no other class has that legal right.

The provision of the Senate bill I have just discussed is a vivid commentary upon the conception of money with which the banking class has been able to permeate the public mind—the conception that there is a necessary relationship between banking and the currency of the people, and that the banking class, whose interest it is to make money as scarce as possible and as high as possible, should control its supply.

Under the Constitution of the United States the power is vested in the American Congress to coin money and to regulate its value. Money is anything which is used to make easy the exchange of commodities and services. The exchange of commodities and services is civilization; that is, money is civilization and civilization is money.

The Dark Ages, which succeeded the fall of the Roman Empire, were largely the result of lack of money; that is, lack of something which would serve as a means by which people could exchange the things they were able to produce. In those days almost the universal conception of money was a conception of gold and silver, and lack of gold and silver during these periods was, as I have said, largely the cause of the mental stagnation and the human misery of the Dark Ages.

A few years ago in a speech on the subject of money, Winston Churchill, former Chancelor of the British Exchequer, made the following significant and eloquent statement:

"It is said that we had forgotten grim laws of supply and demand, as if these laws were absolute, constant, limiting factors forever beyond the reach of human control. There is no limit to the power of mankind to meet that demand. For hundreds of years, in the Middle Ages, the laws of supply and demand were stationary. Everything worked, year after year, at a uniformly low level, and all the populations lived miserably. Then, on a sudden, wages began to rise, enterprise began to quicken, all kinds of new articles and utensils appeared in the cottages or dwellings of the working people. All kinds of new luxuries and comforts opened to the rich and the middle classes. The laws of supply and demand suddenly began to work on a much larger and expanding scale.

"What had happened? A few small ships had come back from across the Atlantic Ocean full of gold and silver, and a gradual, subtle process of inflation had set in. It could not have been the trade of the New World which had refreshed the Old. These poor little ships could only bring spoonfuls of merchandise, and every voyage took over half a year. What they brought was the precious metals which altered, in the sense of expanding, the standards of value throughout the world, and made in those generations expansions in the good living of the human race which have never since been lost."

When the banking bill was being considered in the House an amendment was offered containing a congressional mandate to the Federal Reserve Board to restore the price level as ascertained by the Department of Labor in the wholesale commodity markets for the period covering the years from 1921 to 1929, and afterward to maintain the purchasing power of the dollar substantially stable in relation to a suitable index of basic commodity prices. The amendment also provided for the Secretary of the Treasury to establish a free and open market in which gold and silver could be bought and sold, and that the Secretary, with the advice of the Federal Reserve Board, should determine the amounts and prices at which the Treasury would buy and sell gold and silver. This amendment failed to carry by a very few votes. It will be offered again on the floor of the Senate.

The effect of this amendment would be to reestablish a proper relationship between debtors and creditors to the advantage of each, debtors being able to pay their debts and creditors to receive what is due them. This amendment would reestablish and maintain a fair price for agricultural products, which in turn places buying power in the hands of farmers, which also in turn would start the wheels of industry and give work to our vast army of unemployed.

In 1926 there was a sharp lowering in wholesale prices of basic commodities. This was a notice to the monetary authorities that deflation was beginning. If the amendment, of which I have spoken, had been in the law at that time, the Federal Reserve Board would have been required to lower rediscount rates and to put money in circulation by buying Government bonds.

Fourteen months later the Federal Reserve System did lower rediscount rates and did proceed to buy Government bonds. At that time, however, deflation had proceeded to a point where agriculture and industry were both discouraged. In other words, action was delayed too long to prevent the depression which started in 1929 and from which our people have since suffered so terribly.

With the four levers of control—first, the change of rediscount rates; second, open-market operations; third, a change in the reserve requirements of banks; and fourth, an open market for gold—any tendency toward inflation can be checked immediately and without any serious difficulty.

These levers of control can also be made absolutely effective to prevent deflation provided they are used when the thoroughly understood symptoms of deflation first appear and before the public mind becomes panic-stricken.

I am suggesting that you immediately wire both of your United States Senators asking them to limit the open-market committee to the members of the Federal Reserve Board and not requiring as matter of law for any banker to be named on the Federal Reserve Board, and also requesting them to vote for the amendment, which I have explained, and which is known as the Goldsborough amendment. Your telegram would read about as follows:

"Please support Goldsborough amendment banking bill. Restrict open-market committee to members of Federal Reserve Board."

You will, I know, understand that I have no feeling of opposition to bankers. I have been a bank director myself for more than 30 years. What I have in mind is a currency system in the interest of the 128,000,000 people in the United States, not controlled, dominated, or influenced by any class, and so managed that we can get our tremendous potential production to the people, and get rid forever of the conception of destroying hogs and plowing up our wheat and cotton, with half the people of the country living from hand to mouth.

The problem of production has been solved. The problem of distribution is the one which American statesmanship must solve if all our people are to prosper and if our democratic form of Government is to be saved.

REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include a petition which I have just received.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the Commissioner from the Philippine Islands?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a petition from the Filipino Seamen's Association of America containing an exposition of a just grievance and an earnest prayer for the redress of the same. As said petition is addressed primarily to the United States Government, I have thought of bringing it to the attention of Congress which, I sincerely trust, will be willing to examine the grievance carefully with a view to proposing adequate remedy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following petition:

THE FILIPINO SEAMEN'S UNION OF AMERICA,
San Francisco, Calif., June 21, 1935.

RESOLUTIONS PETITIONING FOR REDRESS OF GRIEVANCES, PASSED AND ADOPTED AT A GENERAL MASS MEETING OF DISCHARGED FILIPINO SAILORS AND SEAMEN WHO WERE FORCED OUT OF THEIR EMPLOYMENT IN THE UNITED STATES MERCHANT MARINE VESSELS WITHOUT SUFFICIENT CAUSE BY ALLEGED AUTHORIZED DELEGATES FROM THE INTERNATIONAL SEAMEN'S UNION, AN AFFILIATE OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR—THE MEETING WAS HELD UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE FILIPINO SEAMEN'S UNION OF AMERICA, WITH HEADQUARTERS IN THE PORT OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA

Whereas the recent wholesale discharge of qualified, union-affiliated Filipino sailors and seamen, without apparent cause and sufficient justification, by alleged high representatives of the International Seamen's Union, an affiliate of the American Federation of Labor, and who for years and years have been in continuous service of United States merchant marine vessels plying in all seven seas of the world, came to the attention of the Filipino Seamen's Union of America, an organization operating within lawful means and composed wholly of bona fide Filipino sailors and seamen who owe allegiance to the sovereignty of the United States of America, and who have in their possessions first citizenship papers and other necessary credentials obtaining in their particular occupations as qualified sailors and seamen; and

Whereas said Filipino sailors and seamen removed and discharged without sufficient and just cause from their old employment in United States merchant-marine vessels by said discriminating high representatives of the International Seamen's Union (A. F. of L.), with their main office at the port of San Francisco, have for years and years rendered satisfactory service, efficiently discharging the duties called for in their particular occupations and faithfully upholding recognized standards and traditions of American organized labor, actively sustaining membership and paying required fees and dues to said International Seamen's Union of America; and

Whereas such unwarranted and discriminatory attitude on the part of said International Seamen's Union or of its authorized delegates in the wholesale and drastic removal of qualified Filipino sailors and seamen affiliated to the same International Seamen's Union local without even giving them an opportunity to be heard and explained of true causes, disregarding past satisfactory service, said International Seamen's Union, claiming and demanding of discharged Filipino sailors and seamen their full citizenship papers or proof of war service either in the United States Army or Navy as the latest new ruling and prerequisite to eligibility to obtaining jobs on merchant-marine vessels and union eligibility, is not only oppressive, unconstitutional, and prejudicial to the general welfare and interests of the people but also a gross and flagrant violation of the arbitration agreement entered into between the employers (shipowners) on the one hand and the said International Seamen's Unions, representing the employees (sailors and seamen) on the other (arbitrators' award, secs. 43–44 and 49), effected and signed before the Board of Arbitration, April 10, 1935; and

Whereas such open and deliberate disregard of membership rights of said union-affiliated Filipino sailors and seamen forcibly removed and discharged from their old employment in United States merchant marine vessels, together with said violation of arbitrators' award and agreement of April 10, 1935, not only defeats the true purpose of unionism and the sound traditions of American organized labor, working in contravention with the constructive policies of recovery of the present administration, but also threatening families and dependents of discharged Filipino sailors and seamen with destitution and untold hardships as a result thereof;

Whereas a continuance of such oppressive and discriminatory wholesale lay-offs of unionized and qualified Filipino sailors and seamen will eventually result in the probable burdening of relief and charitable agencies by affected dependents of said Filipino sailors, victims of discrimination, thus retarding recovery and maliciously creating bitter racial hatreds, national discords, and retaliatory dissensions, needless suspicions and bitter antagonisms threatening industrial peace and the people's economic and social security, breeding distrust and destructive divisions and enmity among workers of various races, and defeating promulgated aims of fraternalism among seafaring men—all in all, a direct threat and menace against established order of society and people's goodwill; and

Whereas further toleration in prolonging such selfish, provocative, un-American and unconstitutional prerequisites or "new rules" laid down by misguided moguls of the International Seamen's Union of America in barring and discriminating against qualified, unionized Filipino sailors and seamen but not possessing of either Army or Navy and war service, and full citizenship papers from further exercising their right to earn a livelihood in the resumption of their services in United States merchant-marine vessels will mean a complete disregard of the effectiveness of our laws and of American institutions—a blot against American democratic principles and sound ideals—an open challenge to American sense of justice and fair play, hitting at the roots of sound democracy, shaking and relinquishing people's confidence and faith in orderly government without special privilege, ignoring the sound dictates and sovereignty of reason, and forming disastrous inequalities and destructive sectional and racial divisions; and

Whereas it has been and still is the firm belief of Filipinos in continental United States as well as those in the homeland (Philippine Archipelago), who owe implicit allegiance to the sovereignty of the United States of America; that by virtue of the still unsevered political ties and quondam friendly relations between the American and the Filipino peoples, and while the glorious stars and stripes are still waving freely in the Philippine skies, their full exercise of their unalienable rights to life and the pursuit of happiness as well as their coveted American protection of their constitutional guarantees—treating all men alike, shall never be impaired: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the United States Government, both National, local, and State, be duly petitioned through the foregoing resolutions for a thorough investigation of the abuses and unlawful practices as herein set forth and thereby cause to issue or enact a preventative measure or legislation in check of future repetition of such discriminations and abuses, with suitable penalties provided therein; and be it further

Resolved, That both the Government or its constituted authorities be further petitioned and requested to cause to issue an order for immediate abolition and stoppage of such discriminations against Filipinos in the service of United States merchant marine vessels and to extend to them ample protection, and to cause to issue another order for their immediate reinstatement and return to their previous employments without prejudice to anyone; and be it still further

Resolved, That the American Federation of Labor and its locals, through the joint cooperation of the employers (shipowners) and the labor arbitration board, be requested to recognize the establishment and creation of a separate and independent Filipino seamen's union, to be chartered by said American Federation of Labor, if so desired and deemed wise and convenient, and which will operate in full conformity with any existing seamen's union or workers' locals upholding American recognized standards and traditions of labor; and be it lastly

Resolved, That the local press and all known dailies and journals in sympathy with the cause of labor, including the Filipino Labor Journal, a semimonthly organ of Filipino labor in the United States, be forwarded copies of these resolutions; also, to high Government officials of the Nation, State, and municipality; to all known agencies of public welfare and charitable and civic bodies; to all the officials of the American Federation of Labor, National, State, and local units; to the Labor Arbitrations Board; to the Employers' or Shipowners' Association; to the government of the Philippine Islands and to the director of the Philippines Bureau of Labor; to California Representatives in Congress—Congresswoman Hon. FLORENCE P. KAHN and Representative MCGRATH, of the House of Representatives; to several workers' locals in the city of San Francisco; to the seamen's union at Manila, known as "Samahang Magdaragat", and the Manila Stevedores' Union, also at Manila, P. I.; to several Filipino and American associations sympathetic to labor and to the Filipino race, with the idea of enabling them to offer certain effective remedy or solution to vital problems confronting Filipino sailors and seamen and their dependents, as hereinabove stated.

In witness whereof, we have hereunto subscribed our names and caused our signatures this 21st day of June, 1935, in the port of San Francisco, State of California.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE IMMIGRATION AND DEPORTATION LAWS

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include a radio speech I made over station WJZ on July 5, 1935, dealing with the problem of immigration.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address which I delivered over the radio on July 5, 1935:

There is in this country today an antialien prejudice which affects, directly or indirectly, a third of our population, for one person out of every three in this country is of foreign birth or foreign parentage.

We are fundamentally a fair, a just, and a tolerant people. There must, therefore, be a reason for this prejudice. That reason lies, I am convinced, in the efforts that have been made to paint the alien as a menace to our form of government, to our jobs, and to our standards of living. This could not be done without showing that there were aliens here in such numbers as to constitute a threat in these respects. This need for numbers to prove the existence of a serious alien problem has given rise to gross exaggerations as to the number of aliens in the country, and particularly as to the number of those that have entered illegally.

The figures so often cited are fantastic exaggerations. No scintilla of proof has ever or ever can be advanced in their support. They not only lack official corroboration but are in complete disregard of the figures of the Bureau of the Census and the Immigration Service and of the official statements of the Department of Labor in this and in the last administration.

There can be no pretence of infallibility in dealing with a subject such as the number of aliens illegally in a country. If they could be accurately counted they could be identified and deported. The following analysis is based on the figures of the Bureau of the Census and of the Immigration Service supplemented by a recent official check of alien seamen arrivals and departures at the port of New York. Such estimates as appear have been arrived at independently by at least two separate individuals or groups, including the Honorable W. N. Doak, Secretary of Labor in the last administration, the present Commissioner and Deputy Commissioner of Immigration and two groups of district directors of immigration. I say now to all of you, who may be within the range of my voice, that there is no such alien menace in America today and there probably never will be. I hold that the law-abiding alien in the United States should not be handicapped, in these distressing days, by threats of wholesale deportations and compulsory naturalizations. Such threats are, in my opinion, un-American in principle.

Now, as to the number of aliens in the United States, a responsible official of the Department of Labor just a few days ago told our House Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in an open public hearing that the total number of foreign-born persons in the United States who had not become naturalized citizens was not in excess of 4,922,000, and that the number of aliens who were here illegally and subject to deportation was not likely to exceed 100,000. The 1930 census gave the total number of persons of foreign birth in the United States as 14,204,149. Of this number 7,919,536 were citizens of the United States and 6,284,613 were aliens, namely, persons of foreign birth or nationality who had not been naturalized.

In 1930 the number of aliens in the United States was 6,284,613. Since 1930 that number has been reduced by death, voluntary departure in excess of new arrivals, deportation and naturalization to about 4,922,000. The number of successful illegal entries during the depression years since 1930 is insignificant and in all probability much more than offset by the unrecorded departures. Recorded departures since 1930 exceed recorded arrivals by six to five.

Of the aliens today in the country, 1,139,000 have filed their declarations of intention to become citizens. Allowing for minor children who will become citizens on the naturalization of the parents, the number of aliens here today who have not declared their intention to become citizens is not in excess of 3,403,000.

These are official figures of the Bureau of the Census and the Department of Labor. They dispose effectively of the allegation that there are 20,000,000 or even 6,000,000 aliens in the United States.

There is a time limit in the present law after which an alien here illegally may not be subject to deportation proceedings solely on the grounds of his or her unlawful entry some years ago.

The figures just mentioned are official and come from sources which cannot possibly be questioned. They have been checked and rechecked, and correspond also with an independent estimate which was made by Mr. Irving Wixon, a deputy commissioner of immigration, who has had 27 years of practical experience in dealing with the alien problem.

If we include with the aliens subject to deportation those who entered illegally prior to July 1, 1924, who are not now deportable, and also those who entered legally but who cannot after a lapse of years prove their legal admission, the total according to the best available estimates does not exceed 400,000.

Secretary Doak called attention to the fact that prior to 1921 there were few incentives to enter the country illegally, as practically the only restrictions were as to certain oriental peoples and the diseased, illiterate, criminal, and immoral. He also called attention to the fact that prior to 1907 no record was made of Canadians or Mexicans entering and that thousands of them were not inspected at all, and said that while many ineligible aliens succeeded in entering the country, in view of the fact that legal entry was so easily accomplished, "it is not believed that the number of illegal entrants was ever large." With reference to the aliens who entered without inspection or without a record being made of their admission, he raised the question as to whether they could rightfully be regarded as entering unlawfully.

These figures, coming from an official source, certainly set at rest any apprehensions that may have been aroused by the wild statements you have heard and seen to the effect that there are 20,000,000 aliens here and 10,000,000 of them are here illegally and should be deported, or even by the smaller figures given that 6,000,000 aliens are here and 3,500,000 aliens unlawfully here should be immediately sent home. None of these wild figures can be supported by any official facts.

You can, therefore, see that a great deal of the hysteria, coming from irresponsible sources, claiming that the number of our aliens is so large, is not based on real fact; and since the alien baiters are unable to make much headway in their promiscuous cry for wholesale deportation of aliens because of their unlawful entry, they seek to arouse alien prejudice by advocating that the 4,000,000 aliens unlawfully here should become citizens within the next year or else be deported. Would it not be surprising to learn that the greatest number of certificates of citizenship ever issued in any one year was not in excess of a quarter million, so that under normal circumstances 4,000,000 aliens could not be naturalized in less than 16 years? Does this spokesman propose the wholesale blanketing of aliens into citizenship for a period of a year? I think he would be the first one to oppose such a bill, if introduced.

Now let us briefly summarize the laws relating to deportation of aliens, as follows:

ALIENS WHO ENTERED PRIOR TO JULY 1, 1924, NOW HAVE LEGAL STATUS

Aliens who entered the United States prior to July 1, 1924, even though they entered without the required examination, are not longer here illegally, but have a legal status in the country conferred on them by the Congress.

1. Aliens who entered prior to June 3, 1921, may not be deported and are permitted to register and eventually become citizens.

2. Aliens who entered between June 3, 1921, and July 1, 1924, may not be deported but are not given the privilege of registry and citizenship.

3. Only those who entered after July 1, 1924, lack a legal status in the country and are subject to deportation.

DESERTING SEAMEN

Under this heading may be grouped the statements relative to seamen deserting and to alien seamen paid off in United States ports. The principal allegations in this connection are the following:

(a) "Five hundred thousand alien seamen deserted in the past 13 years."

The actual number of such desertions is 164,808 in the past 13 years.

(b) "Two hundred and fifty thousand alien seamen desert their ships and enter country illegally each year."

During the greatest period of illegal entry, between 1921 and 1924, the average of such desertions was not 250,000, but 21,481. The average for the past 4 years is 1,580 per annum.

Now, I wish to talk to you a while about the Kerr bill, which is now awaiting action on the floor of the House of Representatives, having been reported favorably by the Immigration and Naturalization Committee back to the House. A great many of you have been given a wrong and false impression of this bill by certain propagandists opposed to the measure. Even some patriotic organizations have expressed opposition to this bill without really knowing its purpose.

The enactment of the Kerr bill will have the inevitable result of reducing the number of aliens in this country, of reducing hereafter the legal and illegal immigration from abroad, of making possible a more effective and humane administration of our deportation laws, and creating generally a more wholesome respect for our immigration laws and the American ideals of fair play.

You would probably be surprised if I assured you that today, under our present inflexible deportation laws, the law-abiding alien, perhaps your neighbor, whose only offense is that he came here some years ago without submitting to proper inspection by an immigration official is subject to mandatory deportation even if that harsh action results in a broken home with an American-born wife and American-born children left here without means of self-support, but that deportation is not possible in the case of a hardened criminal who has managed to escape with light sentences or fines for numerous criminal offenses over a number of years and he is free to continue his criminal activity until he is convicted of two or more crimes involving moral turpitude and for each conviction is sentenced to imprisonment for 1 year or more.

The Kerr bill will make it possible to adjust such cases to meet the offense, not upon any sentimental basis, but solely on the basis of the facts in the case and in the spirit of equal justice and for the best public interest generally.

Let me give you just two illustrations which will show clearly how unequally the present deportation laws are today. Here is a 52-year-old man, well respected in his community where he has prospered somewhat, and has established a happy home where two native-born children romp and play and his native-born wife takes her part in the community life. He has been here about 32 years before he went to Canada about 3 years ago to visit his mother during the Christmas holiday season. Shortly after his return home he became a patient in a State-supported institution for a mental disorder and solely because within 5 years after he returned from Canada he went to a publicly supported hospital he is subject to mandatory deportation even though he had lived here honorably and self-supporting for 32 years before his trip to visit his mother up in Canada.

And here is a man who came here in 1919 and since then has been charged with theft, larceny, forgery, United States mail offense, bigamy, conspiracy to robbery four times, but he has managed to escape with short sentences, fines, and dismissals, and probations; he has actually served time in jails or prisons for a total of just about four and a half years as a result of his 10 arrests, but this alien is not subject to deportation under our present law.

The Kerr bill would grant certain discretionary power to a special committee, made up of officials of three departments of the Government—Justice, State, and Labor—to adjust the status of certain noncriminal law-abiding aliens so that they may stay here permanently and later on become citizens, and to deport certain habitual criminals whose deportation is found to be in the public interest.

The Kerr bill adds four new classes to the groups of aliens subject to deportation and also carries provisions which will enable immigration inspectors to more surely promote proper deportation proceedings and thereby prevent the escape of aliens before proper warrants can be secured. Deportations will undoubtedly be greatly increased in number. Other sections of the Kerr bill will reestablish the importance of the home and the American family-unit and prevent breaking up of honorably established homes here by a humane and just interpretation of the "spirit" of our deportation laws and thereby increase the general respect for the "letter" of the immigration laws.

Students of our immigration laws and of the administration of these laws have for a long time known that injustice and unfairness have resulted from the inflexibility of the provisions for deportation of aliens. The law gives no one, even the President of the United States, authority to use any discretion to prevent the deportation where there is no evidence of any crime, but where the sending away of one alien would break up a home—which is the unit of American civilization—and leave behind members of the family who are unable financially to go away also and yet probably will become charges upon either private or public charity soon after the deportation is accomplished.

A few years ago the President of the United States, then the Honorable Herbert Hoover, appointed what was officially known as the "Commission on Law Enforcement and Observation", and popularly referred to as the "Wickersham Commission."

Regarding the administration of our deportation laws, this Commission said:

"In deportation cases, even when the judgment is just and necessary, hardships are extreme, both upon those deported and upon their families who are permitted to remain; and, in the opinion of the Commission, the limited discretion to permit, in cases of exceptional hardship, a relaxation of the rigid requirements of the present statutes would be consistent with the dignity of a great and humane Nation."

The Kerr bill is so framed that the limited discretion, as advocated by the Wickersham Commission, may be given to a specially appointed committee made up of officials from the Departments of Labor, State, and Justice; surely, no right-minded, patriotic American citizen will stand up and claim that such a committee will jointly permit such abuse of this discretionary power as to utterly break down all our laws relating to immigration and deportation.

Almost every Member of Congress has had presented to him cases of aliens who are held for deportation on the ground that some technical provision of the immigration law has been violated, and I dare say your Representative or your Senator has been asked to intercede in behalf of your neighbor or a near relative of your neighbor who has been held subject to deportation. Perhaps you personally know of cases where you know that deportation would cause extreme hardship to your neighbor's family. Do you think there should not be given to anyone power to exercise proper discretion to prevent that hardship?

You probably know of cases where deportation should apply, but perhaps wonder why it is not made effective—it is probably a fact that those cases you know about are outside the present law, and deportation cannot be made unless the Kerr bill becomes law.

Let me tell you that the Kerr bill will not permit any alien to stay here who is now subject to mandatory deportation on account of criminal activities, or activities designed to harm our form of government or the unlawful disposition of narcotic drugs, or who is not of good moral character.

Also this bill would help us to get rid of the gunman, the racketeer, the State narcotic laws violators, and the aliens who smuggle other aliens unlawfully into the United States, and the habitual criminal who manages to get off with light sentences or just fines for his violations of our criminal laws. None of these can be deported under our present laws. These are new classes made subject to deportation proceedings.

A limited discretion in deportation cases is desired by many who have appraised our immigration laws. To put an end to many hardships resulting from our immigration laws, a limited discretionary authority to avert deportation is granted in the Kerr bill. It would permit an alien found subject to deportation to remain in the United States if he is of good moral character, has not been convicted of a crime involving moral turpitude and has not engaged in subversive political agitation to undermine our Government. His continued residence in this country would be permissible, however, only if he has lived continuously in the United States for 10 years or more, or has a member of his immediate family residing here as a citizen, or has one lawfully admitted for permanent residence. The bill specifically continues the mandatory deportation of criminals, the immoral classes, and those who would wish to destroy our form of Government.

This policy of preventing family separation would not increase immigration. Its objective is to avert the separation of families already established here. Aliens permitted to remain would be charged to the quota of their nationality.

The Kerr bill provides that aliens here in a temporary status but who are entitled to permanent admission in a preference or nonquota status may have their status adjusted without leaving the country. The bill gives them no advantage they do not possess under existing law and merely spares them the expense of a trip to their own or some other foreign country to apply at an American consulate for the nonquota or preference visa to which they are legally entitled. There are numerous examples of the cruel and wholly unnecessary hardship imposed on deserving aliens by requiring them to go abroad to get a piece of paper they can to better advantage be given here, but one will suffice to illustrate the burdensome demand which the law now places upon these aliens.

A girl of Russian parentage, who fled to China and later came to this country to be educated by an American woman, must go back to China. Otherwise, she cannot be admitted to the United States for permanent residence. The girl lost her status as a student through marriage. While her American-born husband could petition for her readmission to this country, she must first journey to the Far East to receive from an American consul what could readily be handed to her in this country.

The required physical examination can be given to better advantage in the United States where there are United States Public Health Service surgeons always available than in a country thousands of miles away where dependence often must be had upon local physicians. It is not necessary for the alien to travel thousands of miles to enable a check of his police record. The American consuls do not accept his statements, but go direct to the police authorities. His financial situation can be checked much better in the United States. Subjecting such people to the cost and family separation incident to a long journey abroad to get a document to which the present law entitled them is a senseless and cruel technicality which serves no useful purpose whatsoever.

There is another class of family separations which are not due to the alien being subject to deportation, but, strangely enough, to his desire to become a citizen. This is the group who entered without inspection during the 3-year period prior to July 1, 1924. They have been given a legal status in the country by the Congress and may not be deported.

Provision has, however, not been made to permit them to become citizens. Their wives in many, if not most, cases are citizens, their children born in the United States are citizens, but to become citizens themselves they must first leave the country and return with an immigration visa. The Kerr bill would extend the privilege of registry to those and others who have lived here continuously for 10 years and put an end to their permanent disability to qualify for citizenship. The bill requires continuous residence for 10 years and a showing that the alien is a person of good moral character and is not subject to deportation. It is unlikely, therefore, that leniency in these cases will be an incentive to illegal entry.

The situation disclosed is one that is shocking in the extreme. It is one which violates our fundamental belief in the sanctity of family ties, and is one which is likely to engender hatred for our institution rather than a feeling that America stands for justice and fair dealing.

While the present law operates with unbelievable severity and harshness in the class of cases first mentioned, it goes to the other extreme in the consideration shown the criminal alien. While not even the President of the United States can avert the deportation of a person who is not a criminal, any police magistrate or judge when imposing a sentence which would render the criminal deportable may by a simple recommendation to the Secretary of Labor tie the hands of the Department and absolutely prevent deportation. There are many other loopholes for the escape of the criminal alien which the Kerr bill will close.

A law that protects the criminal alien and safeguards his stay in this country while in the cases of persons of good character it tears husband from wife and father and mother from their children is un-American and not consistent with the principles upon which our country has been built, and is a law that should and must be changed. The Kerr bill, H. R. 8163, will strengthen the hands of the Immigration Service in dealing with the alien criminal, and with those attempting to enter illegally while removing some of the barbarous effects of the present law in the case of persons of good character and bringing it into consonance with our American principles of justice and humanity.

ISSUANCE OF CERTAIN BONDS IN HAWAII

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 8270) to enable the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize the issuance of certain bonds, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that unless it is a matter of extreme urgency?

Mr. KING. This is a matter of local bond issues in Hawaii, and it is urgent to Hawaii, because we have been unable to cooperate with the P. W. A. until we can have some assurance that these bonds will be authorized.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, some few weeks ago the Delegate from Hawaii made a similar request. I objected to consideration of the bills at that time pending receipt of additional information. Having now received that information and having thoroughly satisfied myself that the bills are meritorious, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may cause to be issued on behalf of the Territory and may authorize any political or municipal corporation or subdivision of the Territory (including the board of water supply of the city and county of Honolulu, and the board of harbor commissioners) to issue of its own behalf bonds and other obligations payable solely from the revenues derived from a public improvement or public undertaking (which revenues may include transfers by agreement or otherwise from the regular funds of the issuer in respect of the use by it of the facilities afforded by such improvement or undertaking). The issuance of such revenue bonds shall not constitute the incurrence of any indebtedness within the meaning of the Hawaiian Organic Act, and shall not require the approval of the President of the United States.

All acts of the Legislature of Hawaii heretofore authorizing the issuance of revenue bonds on behalf of the Territory or by any political or municipal corporation or subdivision thereof are hereby confirmed and ratified.

SEC. 2. That the Territory of Hawaii, any provision of the Hawaiian Organic Act or of any act of this Congress to the contrary notwithstanding, is authorized and empowered to issue bonds in the sum of not to exceed $4,803,000 of the character and in the manner provided in that certain act of the legislature of said Territory, enacted at its regular session of 1935, entitled "An act to provide for public improvements and for the securing of Federal funds for expenditure in connection with funds hereby appropriated for such improvements."

Such bonds may be either term or serial bonds, maturing, in the case of the term bonds, not later than 30 years from the date of issue thereof, and, in the case of the serial bonds, payable in substantially equal annual installments, the first installment to mature not later than 5 years and the last installment to mature not later than 30 years from the date of such issue. And said act of said legislature is hereby ratified and confirmed, subject to the provisions of this act: Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be deemed to prohibit the said act of said Territory by the legislature thereof from time to time to provide for changes in the improvements authorized by said act or for the disposition of unexpended moneys appropriated by said act, and that said bonds may be issued without the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 2966) to empower the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize the issuance of revenue bonds, to authorize the city and county of Honolulu to issue flood-control bonds, and for other purposes. An identical House bill H. R. 8261 has been reported by the Committee on Territories and is now on the House Calendar. The passage of this bill authorizing bond issues will help us in our public-works program.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may cause to be issued on behalf of the Territory and may authorize any political or municipal corporation or subdivision of the Territory to issue on its own behalf bonds and other obligations payable solely from the revenues derived from a public improvement or public undertaking (which revenues may include transfers by agreement or otherwise from the regular funds of the issuer in respect of the use by it of the facilities afforded by such improvement or undertaking). The issuance of such revenue bonds shall not constitute the incurrence of an indebtedness within the meaning of section 55 of the act of April 30, 1900, entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii", as amended, and shall not require the approval of the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. The Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may authorize the city and county of Honolulu to issue its general obligation bonds for the purposes of financing projects for the prevention and control of floods, in a total amount of not to exceed $1,200,000, notwithstanding the existing limitation of indebtedness contained in section 55 of the act of April 30, 1900, entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii", as amended.

SEC. 3. This act shall take effect immediately. All acts of the Legislature of Hawaii heretofore authorizing the issuance of revenue bonds on behalf of the Territory or by any political or municipal corporation or any subdivision thereof, or authorizing the city and county of Honolulu to issue bonds for the control of any protection against floods, are hereby approved, ratified, and confirmed.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 8261) were laid on the table.

SHALL IT BE THE RULE OF GOLD OR THE GOLDEN RULE, THE ALMIGHTY DOLLAR OR ALMIGHTY GOD?

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 10 minutes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall raise no objection so far as this request is concerned, because two or three of my colleagues on the committee are not yet here; but I shall have to object to further requests in order that we may make progress on the T. V. A. bill.

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his point of order?

Mr. KNUTE HILL. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my point of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINDERUP. Mr. Speaker, I realize that in the message I am bringing to my distinguished audience this afternoon I shall have to speak very rapidly in order that I may convey my thoughts in a constructive manner in the very brief time allotted me.

Despite the fact that there is a surging of enthusiasm within me, I want to use the most beautiful words that can be found in the English language, and yet at the same time speak so emphatically and positively that there can be no one within the hearing of my voice that shall doubt exactly what I mean. And I wish to emphasize at this time, Mr. Speaker, that I am not speaking of men. After all, men are as atoms; they are here for a brief interval and then fade away and are scarcely more remembered. But I want to use my valuable time this afternoon to speak of principles—principles that are eternal, that never die—and yet to pause at intervals and call attention to systems that are corrupt or practices that are unfair, where justice has been dethroned or liberty manacled.

First, as a brief prelude to my remarks, may I present my credentials, that I may qualify as an authority on my subject, to you my fellow Congressmen. In my home town I do business with the Federal land bank. I am familiar with the writing of their farm mortgages and every detail associated and connected therewith, from the time the application is first written on the farm until the Federal land-bank bonds are finally exchanged for Farm Mortgage Corporation bonds—nontaxable, interest-bearing bonds, guaranteed by the Government of the United States.

I have long since become convinced that, with the present economic set-up of the Federal Land Bank, it will be utterly impossible for them to ever give relief to farmers in distress. Their system fits only to those farmers who have considerable equity left in the farms even under present land valuations. Thus there are hundreds of thousands of farmers being evicted from their farm homes today, through no fault of their own, but because of a disastrous mistake of our Government, when it allows the banking system of the Nation to take out of circulation approximately $23,000,000,000—basic and credit money—and thereby entirely wiping out the very substantial equity these thousands of farmers had in their farms.

Realizing the plight of the farmers not only in my State but throughout the United States, some 4 years ago I became intensely interested in the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill, the bill House roll 2066, which we are now trying so desperately to have considered on the floor of the House. Understanding how this bill would fit entirely into the machinery of the Federal land bank, without adding new bureaus or creating any greater expense, even to that of changing the form of stationary, in fact, the Frazier-Lemke bill would reduce the expense of making farm mortgages, I became enthusiastic over this farm-mortgage refinance bill to the extent that I began to explain this plan over the radio in my weekly broadcasts, which covered more than seven agricultural States, also in speeches which I delivered at many points in our part of the country.

Naturally when I came to Washington I immediately associated myself with the proponents of the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill in order that I might know positively that every step or every transaction would fit in with the set-up of the Farm Credit Administration here in Washington, as well as that of the Federal land banks out in the Territory. I interviewed at length Chief Counsel Hovey, Governor Myers, and Deputy Governor Hill, of the Farm Credit Administration, as well as Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau, and after this most thorough investigation I was more than ever pleased and convinced with the similarity of the entire set-up, differing only when it came to the finals of each application, wherein the farmer would pay 1½-percent interest to the Government and 1½-percent amortized payment on the principal each year, instead of paying 4 or 5 percent interest to the Federal land bank; and the Government would thus be lending its credit to the farmers direct, receiving 1½-percent interest for the use of such credit, instead of, as now, lending its credit to the Federal land bank—a quasi-Federal institution—free and guaranteeing interest and principal of the bonds to the bondholders.

And so I came to Washington to help promote this righteous cause, and I doubt if you can imagine my surprise when Congressmen who have been here for several years explained to me that in their judgment there was no question whatever but what the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill would be passed by a large majority through the Agricultural Committee, both of the Senate and the House; that it would, when presented, pass the Senate and the House by very large majorities; but that there was something in Congress known as the "Rules Committee" that had more power than all the rest of Congress; that in fact it eclipsed the power of 525 Members of Congress, including 96 Senators and 435 Representatives, the duly elected representatives of more than 125,000,000 American citizens; that no legislation could go through Congress unless this Rules Committee was favorable.

This was a shock to me, as I have always been a Democrat and believed in the principles as taught by Thomas Jefferson. This was so far different from what I had anticipated, especially in a Congress that was composed of three-fourths Democrats, honored with the privilege to enact real Democratic legislation in a Democratic way, as well as being clothed with responsibility. Everything was in the hands of Democrats. My new acquaintances among Congressmen and proponents of the Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill continuously warned me about the danger and the opposition of the Rules Committee, to which I replied to my new friends, "You must be unnecessarily alarmed; you are turning backward the clock of time; you are turning back to the time of Republican Cannonism, when the people of this Nation were denied the privilege of being heard on the floor of the People's Congress; this cannot be possible under a Democratic administration, not under the party of the great liberal, Thomas Jefferson. We have long since destroyed Cannonism and such tyranny of government."

Do you not remember Nebraska sent GEORGE W. NORRIS, one of her worthy sons from the plains, to Washington, to this Congress some years ago, and he stood where I now stand defending the righteous cause of liberty and freedom from political dictatorship, denouncing the gag-rule, and demanding the free representation of the people's interests on the floor of this House. Do you not remember how he placed his heel on the head of the venemous snake called Cannonism and crushed the life out of this hideous creature that was robbing the people of their constitutional inherent rights. And thus not alone our State but the Nation learned to love the now Senator NORRIS, this son of Nebraska, and thus has he builded a monument to himself in the hearts of his people.

Then, too, we sent another of our native sons of Nebraska, W. J. Bryan; we called him the "Great Commoner"; throughout the world he was known as the "Prince of Peace." He came to Washington; he, too, stood where I now stand, and also in this historic Chamber he reminded you of the great ideals of true democracy, reminded you of the fact that the Government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed; he advised you of the danger of bureaucracy usurping the place of democracy, of committees clothed with power that abused their power, of the danger of vast powers in the hands of a few. He taught that human rights were prior to property rights and that devotion and sincerity to high ideals was the great and noble aspiration of the Democratic Party; he revived the democracy of old, amplifying the principles of true Jeffersonianism until those whose patriotism was waning received a new inspiration, the despondent received new courage, and those becoming reconciled to economic slavery received new hope.

Do not tell me that this noble Democracy has deteriorated to the point of Cannonism, that the Republican snake of old has changed its hue and has now taken on a Democratic color. I cannot believe that this Democratic Congress will stand for so great an injustice to the people of our Nation. If this be true, then shall the State of Nebraska once again call for one more disciple of justice to the toiling masses, one more guardian of the great principles of Democracy, one more soldier to fight in the front line trenches against this injustice. Am I the one to answer that call? If so, I accept the challenge, for no privilege could be more welcome than that I might stand here and defend labor in its righteous cause, and the farmer, the tillers of the soil, that are fast becoming economic slaves, cringing, crawling slaves, pleading and begging and fighting for the crumbs that may fall from the table of plenty, that table that they themselves have decorated with an abundance of everything, an abundance that they themselves have produced by dipping their hands deep into the God-given fountain, the fountain of natural resources of the earth, shaping them into blessings for humanity.

In coming back, now, to my first introduction to Washington, to my first contact in Congress. Congressman LEMKE introduced this righteous bill, known as the "Frazier-Lemke farm mortgage refinance bill", in the House, and Senator FRAZIER introduced a like bill in the Senate. I filed a petition on the Speaker's desk requiring, according to the gag rule, 218 signatures of Members to discharge the Rules Committee and bring the bill out on the floor of the House for consideration. And so the bill started on its long and tedious voyage through Congress. After long and extensive hearings in the Agricultural Committee of the House, wherein witnesses were called in from far and near to testify for or against the bill, this bill finally passed the House Agricultural Committee with a majority of 18 to 5, and that committee appointed a committee from its members to see the Rules Committee of the House and ask that we might have a hearing before said Rules Committee in an effort to have the bill brought on the floor of the House. This hearing was denied.

About this time the Senate Committee on Agriculture began hearings on the bill, and after extensive hearing in that body the Senate commitee passed the bill without one dissenting vote, and recommended its passage by Congress. Meanwhile legislatures from 32 States passed resolutions memorializing and petitioning Congress to pass this righteous bill for the relief of farmers in distress and for the rehabilitation of agriculture. Regardless of all this the Rules Committee refused to give us a rule to permit this bill to be heard on the floor of Congress.

During this time the proponents and friends of the bill were busy telling about the advantages of this Frazier-Lemke farm-mortgage refinance bill until we had succeeded in getting 211 Members to sign our petition; in other words, we lacked only 7 more signers in order to force it out on the floor of the House. Then, about this time, enemies of the bill became busy, began to prevail on various Members and suggest to them, for political reasons, that they take their names off the petition, they succeeded to the extent that 13 of those who had formerly signed took their names off the petition.

It was rumored that President Roosevelt opposed the bill, so we appointed a committee of six of the proponents of the bill to call on the President, who assured this committee that he had never authorized or suggested to anyone that names be taken off the petition; furthermore he stated, that in his opinion, if we had 200 signers—and we had at that time 205—that he thought that this bill should be heard on the floor of the people's Congress, and I speak with authority in this matter, as I was one of the committee to wait upon the President. At this particular time we have again increased the number of signatures up to 209, now lacking just 9 signatures to bring the bill out.

Fellow Members of Congress, what is this strange, peculiar, omnipotent, hidden power in this Congress that is depriving your constituents and mine, the citizens of a free Nation, to be heard on the floor of the people's Congress? What is this strange peculiar power that is like a Joshua of old who said to the sun and the moon, "Stand still", and they stood still, while he plundered and murdered and destroyed men, women, and children? And so this mighty, secret, silent, and destructive power says to the Senate and the House of Representatives, the people's Congress, stand still and refuse to function in your legislative power, and they stand still, while 300,000 fathers are pleading and begging that the Frazier-Lemke bill may be passed and their homes may be spared for their wives and children, their homes for which they would give their lives and would be tempted to sell out heaven. And Congress stands like a silent sphinx and sanctions by toleration the destruction of the Nation's homes that shall determine the welfare of the future of our great Nation.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman from Nebraska yield?

Mr. BINDERUP. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Is it possible that this power resides in the White House?

Mr. BINDERUP. I am asking you, my audience, what is this power, and each one can answer for himself according to the dictates of his own conscience. I ask again what is this giant power that is robbing the people of their liberties and their rights in this Congress? Power that, like a thief in the night, crawls upon its victims and stabs a dagger in their back. This silent power that takes from the people their right to be represented on the floor of the House of Representatives. This power that whispers, "Stand still", in the Senate and House of Representatives, while 300,000 mothers, with tear-stained cheeks, are begging and praying that Congress will pass the Frazier-Lemke bill and save their homes for their children's sake, and this silent power ignores their pleadings and scoffs at their prayers. What is that silent, mighty power in Congress with a heart of stone that is not moved by the pleadings of millions of children that are being put out of their homes in a cold and heartless world in order to protect interest, profits, and dividends. The political machine that grieves not; a living system that has no heart.

What is that silent, whispering voice that like a wizard's voice heard from the tomb of tyranny and Cannonism, what is that power that amplifies the voice of the Rules Committee so loud that it drowns the pleadings of 125,000,000 American citizens, closes the ear and seals the lips of 435 duly elected representatives of the people. Not a soul in or out of Congress could possibly object except predatory wealth and coupon clippers. No one has dared to criticize this bill, only one expression have I heard from a Congressman who asked me the question, if you begin to finance homes of this Nation directly by the Government, who is going to pay the interest that will enable loan companies and insurance companies to live? Let my closing remarks be an answer to the gentleman's question.

My fellow Congressmen, in conclusion let me appeal to you. Is gold so precious and human life so cheap; is human greed so powerful and human love so weak; are interest and dividends to be considered rather than the homes wherein is molded the disposition and character of your children and mine—homes that are the units in the foundation of our great Government and the bulwark of the Nation, homes that are God's sanctuary on earth to man? Shall property rights be considered more than human rights? Shall we continue, my friends, to be governed under the despotism of the rule of gold, or shall we govern, as our great Constitution provides, and as the great Master has decreed, by the Golden Rule? Shall our people be governed by the tyranny of the almighty dollar or by the love of an Almighty God?

Is Freedom's holy light eclipsed by darkness?
Shall Justice take its mandates from the knave?
Is Liberty a plaything for the heartless
That man should make his fellowman a slave?
Behold, my friends, the light, the torch of reason,
That silence midst injustice is a sin;
To kiss the hand that wields the whip is treason
Against your God, your Nation, and your kin.

PROPOSED CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one-half minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAAS. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced the following proposed constitutional amendment:

That the following article is hereby proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the several States:

"Every public act or public resolution of Congress shall, after having been presented to the President and approved by him, or not returned by him within 10 days (Sundays excepted) after it has been presented to him unless its return has been prevented by adjournment of the Congress, or after having been returned has been repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and the House of Representatives, shall not become a law unless presented by the President to the Supreme Court of the United States for its decision on the constitutionality thereof and until 60 days (Sundays excepted) after it has been so presented. It shall be the duty of the Supreme Court to render such decision within such 60 days."

Because of the rapid changes taking place in our economic readjustment, it is necessary that the people and business men in particular know whether the acts of Congress are valid or not.

It is not only disconcerting but dangerous to make major readjustments in our economic structure through regulatory legislation, which is later found to be unconstitutional especially after the changes themselves have been made. It is wasteful, costly, and leads only to chaos. The results can only retard natural recovery. It would be a tremendous assistance to the business man and to the citizen in general if he knew that all of the laws under which he must operate were constitutional as soon as they were put into operation.

The effects of this proposed amendment will accomplish that very purpose. This amendment if adopted as a part of the Constitution of the United States will hereafter eliminate the uncertainty of the laws passed by Congress, as to their constitutionality.

Sometimes now it is years before the validity of a law can be determined. We have recently had the experience of Congress passing a far-reaching measure affecting the lives of every individual in the country. After the necessary adjustments were made to conform to this law and conditions were beginning to resume stability, under the new regulations, the law was found to be unconstitutional and the result was near chaos. There is no reason why the United States Supreme Court should not aid and assist in the administration of our laws by this method of rendering decisions upon the constitutionality of the acts of Congress as soon as they are passed.

I believe that the adoption of this constitutional amendment would be a tremendous step forward for this country and would eliminate 99 percent of the objections and criticisms to the present procedure of the United States Supreme Court.

MANUFACTURE, IMPORTATION, SALE, AND USE OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a quarter of a minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GUYER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced in the House a bill—H. R. 8739—prohibiting the manufacture, importation, exportation, transportation, sale, and use of spirituous, vinous, malt, and fermented liquors, liquids, or solids containing alcohol which may be used as beverages, applicable to the District of Columbia only.

IN BEHALF OF DEFENSELESS CITIZENS OF WASHINGTON

First. I have introduced this bill for the Nation's Capital because the citizens of Washington are powerless to defend themselves against the flood of liquors and the curse of intoxication which is overwhelming the Nation's Capital. The only thing that the citizens of Washington can do is to petition Congress asking for those things which are for their common welfare and safety. In common with all other Congressmen, I feel a responsibility, and also feel that I am expressing the sentiment of my own constituents which within the year registered their disapproval of unrestricted barter and sale of intoxicating liquors. A large number of good citizens of the District of Columbia, represented by a committee of citizens who desire safe and clean government for their families and neighbors, have joined their forces and are now petitioning Congress for relief from the intolerable conditions created without their consent in the District of Columbia.

PROTECTION OF YOUNG EMPLOYEES OF THE UNITED STATES

Second. The different branches of the Government—legislative, executive, and judicial—have selected from the best homes in the country the brightest and most promising young men and women for employment in the District of Columbia. These young people who are selected, in almost all instances, have been taken from homes where their health and morals have been jealously guarded and their training carefully directed, are thrown among strangers and in their youth relieved from the restraints of home, naturally and readily adopt the habits and practices of their new associates and are themselves exposed to unusual temptations and dangers. The parents and friends of these young people have a right to know that they are surrounded by the best possible environment, and I believe that the vast majority of them would shield these young people from the inebriety and vice which are sure to surround them in a city where one can hardly walk a hundred feet on the street without passing a place where intoxicating liquors are sold without any serious restrictions. If there is any one population in the Republic which more than any other demands the protection of the Nation's lawmakers, it is the helpless citizenship of the District of Columbia. Congress, and every Member individually, should be held responsible for the conditions in the District so far as it is in their power to control. There are practically 2,000 licensed saloons in Washington, and some assert that there are from 5,000 to 10,000 illicit places where liquors are sold, all of which are immoral in their influence and many of them veritable dens of vice.

RESPONSIBILITY OF CONGRESS

Third. It is the business of the Congress of the United States, which possesses absolute power to govern the District of Columbia, to make Washington a model city not only for the United States but for the world, and also the safest place for family homes, which is the foundation of our free institutions. This certainly cannot be accomplished while the National Capital is overrun with saloons. The bill which I have introduced is the result of the studies and work of a special committee of prominent District lawyers, who, taking the old Sheppard Law as a model, have written this law, correcting some of the weaknesses of the Sheppard Act.

A DISGRACEFUL RECORD

An examination of the police records of the District discloses a deplorable state of affairs since the repeal of the eighteenth amendment. The advocates of repeal promised to banish the bootlegger, promote sobriety and temperance, and check the prevalence of crime. It has accomplished nothing of the kind, but instead crime has increased and drunkenness doubled, with every form of vice increasing.

The following facts compiled from the police records of the District illustrates the intolerable conditions which have obtained since repeal:

Increase in 1934 over 1932

	Percent
Arrests for intoxication	57
Arrests for driving motor cars while intoxicated	39
Arrests for disorderly conduct	19
Arrests for misdemeanors	30
Arrests for felonies	11
Daily average arrests	34

In 1934 there were 510 arrests of minors for intoxication. There are no previous records.

Arrests of women for intoxication, 11 months (fiscal year 1935), was 1,493.

Certainly such a condition of affairs justifies some legislation that will better conditions in the Capital. This bill, I believe, will solve the problem, if enacted and enforced.

NATURAL AND INEVITABLE FRUIT OF LIQUOR TRAFFIC

We are not surprised that these offenses have increased at such alarming rates; that crimes of every sort have increased. Crime and liquor are always partners. Repeal has not, as promised, eliminated the bootlegger and banished the illicit liquor vendor. Repeal was accomplished by duplicity and hypocrisy. It was brought about by the most stupendous campaign of mendacity ever launched against a righteous cause in a civilized country.

WAR A DEMORALIZING INFLUENCE

The Great War had a profound influence upon this country, as it did upon every country in the world, whether involved in it or not. But those influences and post-war conditions were not calculated to buttress the eighteenth amendment. There came out of that war many sinister influences and few good ones. In my opinion, the eighteenth amendment was about the best thing that resulted from the war, if we assume it was such a byproduct.

We have only to consult the progress of the better things of life, the matters of the spirit, to understand and appreciate the effect of that war on the moral atmosphere of this and other countries. The most obvious effect in this direction was the increase in desperate crimes.

Legislatures and Congresses, bench and bar, pulpit and platform, press and radio have contributed their best toward the solution of our crime problems.

WHAT CREATED THE CRIME WAVE

The discussions have embraced many conflicting conclusions. One contention was that the eighteenth amendment was the cause and source of that criminal reign of terror which ranged from rum running and bootlegging to kidnaping and banditry. Another that it was rather the lack of prohibition, the absence of energetic enforcement of that law. It was charged that venal or unsympathetic public officials, State and National, aided and abetted by an adverse and mercenary propaganda, had permitted the traffic in illicit liquor to become so impregnably intrenched as a colossal financial racket that enforcement efforts, however sincere and energetic, were nullified.

Thus the cupidity of the liquor vendor, the criminal indifference or corruption of public officials, and the hypocrisy of the bootlegger's patron joined the underworld in creating a reign of terror not paralleled in the criminal annals of this country. The patent and obvious fact is that the liquor racket was just a part of the lawlessness that ever follows great wars, as was the case with the Thirty Years' War, the Napoleonic wars, and our own Civil War.

CRIME A UNIVERSAL SCOURGE

Every country involved in the World War had its own crime problem, and ours exceeded others in proportion to the ease and opportunity for criminal activities, the facility of "get-away", the profits realized, and the hope of escaping punishment occasioned by reason of the seeming immunity afforded by our legal system and the protection thrown around the accused.

The World War, with its unprecedented brutality and hatreds, did not tend to make the lion and the lamb bedfellows in our domestic criminal meadows. That sort of psychology and trend of thought since the war and during the depression has created a fertile soil for crime and degeneracy, with a sort of incipient revolt against civilization and the finer things of the spirit. The World War, with its physical destruction, was as usual followed by moral retrogression. Crime was a startling manifestation of this period of retrogression. Crime may not be the most far-reaching menace of this age of violence and transition, but it certainly is the most obvious.

AESTHETIC EFFECT OF RETROGRESSIVE ERA

How about art and literature? These spiritual entities should reflect the soul and spirit of our national life. Books? I have two in mind. Both best sellers. I shall not name them. Let us draw the veil of charity. One the critics said would be one of the greatest books of this era. It contains descriptions which not so many years ago were considered unprintable outside of purely pornographic literature. In the other the facts recited were so salacious that a so-called "heathen" nation protested against it as a reflection upon its standard of ethics. These are extreme examples, but they measure the taste of the public appetite for literary provender. Do not shoot the authors. They, like other purveyors to the public service, strive to satisfy the demand of their public.

Art? Is there a recent painting which by its beauty or thought has caught the gaze of the public eye? With the exception of Borglum's creations at Stone Mountain and Mount Rushmore, which rival the majestic grandeur of ancient Egypt, our sculpture has produced nothing since the war worthy of serious notice. The drama? The cinema, movie, or silver screen, whichever suits your taste? Sensuality enthroned! Sex deified! Vice and crime lionized! Again do not blame the theater and the picture industry too much, for they, too, cater to the popular taste.

Music? While the public is famished for good music you cannot turn on the radio without being feloniously assaulted by a jangling nightmare of jazz. Literature, art, music, and the drama constitute the mirror which should reflect the soul life of the people, the stream on whose bosom should be etched the intellectual and moral life of the Nation. We must not blame the stream too much if, when we look upon its surface it sends back a picture black with diabolism and lechery.

THE AMERICAN HOME

How about the home life of our people? It has drifted far from what it once was. Topics of conversation once only whispered in the sacred precincts of the ancient and honorable but now extinct livery stable and barnyard; which refinement once banished and gentle breeding rebuked, are now welcomed at the dinner table and in the drawing room. What of it? Like modern bathing suits, feminine swearing, and unusual atrocities in criminal history, all are harbingers of the new day, a kind of ethical new deal in which the old order changeth and we behold a new heaven and a new earth. Nothing, however, is peculiar to us. In continental Europe they have gone as far beyond us in social revolution as their arbitrary and absolute dictatorships transcend our bureaucratic autocracies and executive invasions.

A SORDID STORY

In one country of continental Europe, a writer says that due to post-war economic pressure and war-time standards of morality, young men and women live together outside the pale of marriage with the consent and approval of their parents "without losing social status or business standing." Nothing like that here, particularly at the "grass roots." Sound as a dollar. Yet, family authority is relaxed or paralyzed. Flaming youth unleashed. In some exalted circles matrimony is a joke. Children brought up as they would, not as they should, go. And we wonder at the prevalence of crime. Along with all this sordid story we decide to turn loose the curse of liquor, whose greatest contribution to society is a new harvest of criminals.

PLOWING UNDER THE CROP OF CRIMINALS

If you want less criminals, stop raising them. All speed to J. Edgar Hoover's swift triggers and more power to his steel-jacketed messengers. But we have used all this as a cure for crime. To the prison and the gallows we have added the lethal cell and the "chair"; sent criminals to the gibbet, the gallows, the solitary cell and the "chair", but the surplus only increases. Our modern crop-reduction theory does not work here. We just cannot plow them under fast enough. I repeat, stop raising criminals. The secret and hope lies in the American home, church, and school, where character is molded. Intoxicating liquor is the mortal enemy of each of these constructive institutions. Liquor is everlastingly destructive. Of course we should exclude alien criminals, and be more economical with paroles for hardened criminals, but our hope is in the constructive laboratory of human character found in the home, church, and school.

GIVE VIRTUE AND INTELLIGENCE A CHANCE IN THE CAPITAL OF THE UNITED STATES

But these benign institutions should not be forced into competition here in the Capital with the destructive agencies of alcohol, which is both a physical and social poison. These instrumentalities of virtue and intelligence should be given the widest and most favorable field for the development of character, unhampered by the influence and malignant venom of 2,000 legalized saloons and unnumbered speakeasies. The mission of this bill is to make it easier for people to be decent, and more difficult for them to make failures and wrecks of their lives here in the Capital of the United States.

ANONYMOUS EDITORIALS

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MORITZ. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a bill—H. R. 8763—which provides that all editorials or parts of editorials be signed by the writer thereof, and I take this opportunity to explain why I have introduced it.

Mr. Speaker, nobody honors an anonymous letter. In fact, anyone with an inch of honor throws an unsigned letter into the waste basket. The reason is that anyone who has not the courage to sign his or her name does not deserve the slightest recognition. Furthermore, an unsigned letter is evidence often of untruths and is only written for the purpose of disseminating trouble.

The same can be said of many newspaper editorials. These editorial writers come under the class of anonymous letter writers. No one has ever tried to force them out of ambush.

By virtue of their office and by reason of the peculiar position which they enjoy behind the closed doors of their "holy of holies" they can write as bitter and defamatory an editorial as they wish, knowing full well that the public will not know its authorship.

How many times these editorial writers must have chuckled to themselves after completing their vicious articles, and how many times have these brave "knights of the inner circles" smiled in satisfaction after they have coldly and maliciously stabbed their public-office victims and enjoyed the wild flow of blood that they caused.

These editorial writers are learned and they know that the public will not know who they are. It is not sufficient for these capitalistic chain-store newspapers to publish the name of the editor in chief. Everyone knows that the editor in chief has many assistants who are unknown to the public; in fact, who would be the wiser if an unfriendly outsider not even connected with the paper should write a bitter editorial for revengeful motives and the article be accepted by the newspaper as an editorial?

Just the other day, because the mayor of Pittsburgh permitted his cabinet member to dismiss an employee, the editorial of a Pittsburgh paper spoke of William McNair, the mayor, in bitter, libelous words, namely, "a cruel, sadistic nature", when, as a matter of fact, the present mayor of Pittsburgh has practically maintained all of the present employees of the past administration and his cabinet member had no alternative but to dismiss this employee, because, forsooth, this employee in his pride would not consent to a lesser position paying about $3,900 a year.

The charges in this editorial were that the mayor delighted in inflicting cruelty, in causing wives anxiety and worry, when in truth there is not a more kind-hearted man in the world.

All this had to be endured because an editorial writer gloated in writing these lines behind closed doors, knowing full well his identity would be forever kept secret.

Mr. Speaker, I do not ask for a curtailment of free speech. Let the editorial writers continue, if they wish, in their bitter attacks on public men; but under my bill I expect to force them to sign their names so that the practices of a sneaking, man-eating, cruel, character assassinator may not be carried on in secret.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8632, with Mr. DRIVER in the chair.

The clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SMITH], a member of the committee, 5 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I also yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of talk about the House bill destroying the program of the T. V. A. The program that is referred to is, of course, the power program of the Authority, and how is it contended that the House bill will destroy this program?

The program as laid down in the original bill is for the sale of surplus power created by the other developments of the Authority. The bill provided that the presently existing dam at Muscle Shoals should be turned over to the Authority and that one additional dam should be built, the Cove Creek Dam, now known as the "Norris Dam." The Authority, in its work, has followed a program of construction of two additional dams without any report to Congress of its plan for the building of these dams. This has raised a question as to the legality of its action in building these two dams, the Wheeler and the Pickwick Landing Dams.

The House bill provides, by reference, that the action of the Authority in building these dams is validated. The House bill also provides that the Authority shall make known to the Congress what its plans are for future development, that it shall have definite plans and that it shall at the time of their next annual report report its plans to the Congress so that we will not have a recurrence of this legal question.

The directors of the Authority are able men, and their integrity is not questioned, but I feel that they are to be criticized for their impatience with any regulation or with any supervision and for the reluctance they have shown in the past to make known their future plans to this body.

We know that they plan in general a yardstick of hydroelectric power costs. I believe that the vast majority of this body would like to see an honest yardstick established, which will supplement the work which the Power Commission is doing today in making a comparative rate study throughout the country; but before committing this Government to the construction of dams of a type not necessary for navigation or flood control, we should know what power will be produced by these dams, what the generation of this power will cost, where it will be marketed, and how these dams will fit in with the yardstick.

When the three dams now under construction are completed, with the existing dam there will be a dependable capacity of approximately 300,000 kilowatts. How many residential consumers and how many industrial consumers will be necessary to use this great output, and where will these consumers come from, in view of the surplus of capacity that the Army engineers claim already exists in this district? The Authority should tell us what its plan is as to consumers and how it is going to use this yardstick.

The House bill contains five important changes in the basic law:

First. Section 2, to which I have already referred, which validates the construction of Wheeler and Pickwick Landing Dams, and requires recommendations from the directors for the unified development of the river.

Second. Section 3, which allows the directors to convey land.

Third. Section 8, which establishes accounting procedure, and which limits the time during which the Authority may sell below the cost of production.

Fourth. Section 13, bringing the Authority under the supervision of the General Accounting Office.

Fifth. Section 14, which provides for condemnation of existing transmission lines rather than duplication by the Authority if its efforts to purchase the existing lines are unsuccessful.

It is claimed that these changes in the law will destroy the program of the Authority. On the contrary, it should put the work of the Authority on a sounder basis. If no definite plan exists, one should be decided upon before we are committed to the expenditure of many millions for additional dams.

If the program of the Authority will be crippled by the limitations of time within which it can sell below cost, the Congress should be informed as to the length of time the Authority will need to establish itself on a paying basis. If it is necessary to extend the time, the reason for doing so should be shown to the next Congress.

Perhaps the most controversial of the amendments proposed by the committee is that which places the Authority on the same basis as other Government departments in relation to the General Accounting Office. There has been a great deal of talk about the purchase of cows, steam shovels, and other articles without bids, with hints at improper conduct. After the extensive hearings of the committee and the testimony of the directors and the Comptroller General, it is safe to say there is not the slightest evidence of any fraud or dishonesty connected with the Authority. This amendment will remove the possibility of any such unfounded charges in the future and will protect both the Authority and the Government by the application of the principles on which we run all other departments.

The only argument used against the amendment proposed in section 14 of this bill is that it will cause delay in the courts. Because of this, the owners of existing transmission lines would be denied any chance of their day in court or any chance of showing that their contention as to value is correct and that of the Authority is wrong. If we do not adopt this amendment, we place altogether too much arbitrary power in the hands of the directors of the Authority. The argument is unsound, un-American, and typical of the hysteria which surrounds the power question today. About this whole project in the Tennessee Valley there is an atmosphere of great haste, and the reason for the haste is not apparent. It is a project which is expected to develop for years in the future, and no necessity has been shown for rushing it through without any regard for justice or for existing law.

The House bill provides proper supervision of the development of this work, and I hope the committee will adopt its provisions.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. Did the gentleman ever live in a city that tried to purchase a competing utility?

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. I never lived in a city that tried to purchase one or had the power of condemnation.

Mr. FORD of California. If the gentleman had, he would find that anywhere from 3 to 10 years is the limit within which you can get at the matter, because they go into all the courts and go right down the line to the Supreme Court, and simply leave you out on a limb.

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. If such a delay exists, it can be corrected by a change in the system of the courts, and it is not an argument for arbitrarily seizing property without any judicial action.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee, of all the crazy, cockeyed schemes hatched from the diseased and disordered brains of the " new dealers ", the T. V. A. easily takes the prize.

Muscle Shoals was the product of real emergency, and the only justification of the birth of this costly child was the state of war in which we found ourselves. After spending approximately $150,000,000 on the project, it proved to be an expensive experiment and bitter disillusionment. What happened 2 years ago last May? The T. V. A. Act was passed to salvage this wreckage. What for? For the improvement of navigation and flood control of the Tennessee River, reforestation, prevention of soil erosion, and several other purposes, but mainly for national defense.

It is obvious, however, to anyone who heard or will read the hearings before the House Military Affairs Committee during the past 5 months that the T. V. A. has paid little or no attention to national defense. The testimony of both Dr. Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal clearly shows that the chief purpose and one absorbing and overshadowing interest of the T. V. A. is the development, distribution, and sale of hydroelectric power, not only to the people in the immediate Tennessee Valley but to communities and centers in remote areas. This is in flagrant violation of the intent of Congress and purpose of the original act of May 18, 1933.

It is true that the Board was given the authority to dispose of that surplus power not needed for the operation of the locks at the dams for aiding navigability and flood control of the Tennessee River, but the power program, according to the act, was to be incidental and not fundamental. Notwithstanding this clear and concise intent of Congress, the T. V. A. has made its power program of primary interest and supreme importance. Instead of following the recommendations of the Board of Army Engineers to construct low dams for navigation purposes, the Authority has proposed to construct high dams at an increased cost of 75 percent, for generation of additional electric power. Furthermore, the Authority was authorized to operate only Muscle Shoals and Cove Creek Dam, when completed. Beyond this it could not go in actual construction of dams, but was required to act as a planning board and to report to Congress any recommendations for further development of the valley.

Nothwithstanding this distinct limitation the Board, without reporting to Congress, and without legal or constitutional authority, has already under construction and contemplation of construction several other dams. The estimated cost of Norris, Wheeler, Pickwick, Hiwasee, French Broad, and Aurora Dams—these six alone—aggregate $181,000,000. Already the total authorized expenditures since the T. V. A. took control in June 1933 amounts to $121,523,675.58. This does not include the $150,000,000 spent on Muscle Shoals up to the time the Authority took possession.

Dr. Morgan testified that the T. V. A.'s program was a continuing program and would perhaps run over a century's time. Of course, that is a general answer and leaves the program a bit vague and indefinite. What assurance have we that the utopian dream, with its present plans for power dams and power houses and lines, for improvement of navigation and flood control, for fertilizer manufacture, for prevention of soil erosion, for reforestation and reclamation of marginal lands, its plans to cure all the social ills and solve all the economic problems of the people in the Tennessee Valley, will not exceed in cost $1,000,000,000 within the next 10 years?

When will the time come when the T. V. A. will not come to Congress for additional appropriations? And what will the ultimate cost be if President Roosevelt and the present administration carry out their desire to extend the activities of the T. V. A. into every section of the United States? Can one fill a sieve with water? How long will the barrel remain filled with the bunghole out?

I regret that on yesterday sinister aspersions were cast on the Aluminum Co. of America, and on Arthur V. Davis, chairman of its board. I never saw Mr. Davis until he appeared before our committee; I have not seen him since. Never have I listened to a more temperate and reasonable witness. He spoke with sincerity and candor. There was no insolence, evasiveness, or air of intellectual superiority about him. With a modesty and humility, unknown to "brain trusters", he testified in a straightforward manner, and his sense of fairness would impress any unprejudiced and impartial listener.

Why this unwarranted and unjustifiable attack on the Aluminum Co. of America? What has this corporation done to merit this blind censure? This is what it has done: 25 years ago, long before T. V. A. or Muscle Shoals were dreamed of, this private company, with its own and not the taxpayers' money, located on the Little Tennessee River to develop and utilize hydroelectric power in the manufacture of aluminum. Since that time, in 1910, this company has had from 10 to 75 engineers surveying 104 miles of this river and working on the engineering development of this region. This company has plans which comprise eight developments in western North Carolina and eastern Tennessee. The three dams already built and the three basins already developed are valued at $40,000,000. The estimated cost of completion of this program is $60,000,000, which will represent a total investment, when finished, of $100,000,000 of private money.

The Aluminum Co. of America has employed as many as 4,000 men and are now employing 2,500. During the past quarter of a century it has built for the benefit of the people, churches, schools, hospitals, commercial buildings, employees' clubs, and recreational centers. The people there are satisfied, as their Representative in this House will tell you. They want this company to go on with its development program.

That program is today halted. It is threatened with paralysis. It is in danger of extinction. The Aluminum Co. has invested $5,000,000 in its five undeveloped basins. Into the largest of these basins the T. V. A. has gone, and shown its black hand by purchasing, at an outrageously high price, two small pieces of land—12½ acres in one piece and 1,500 square feet in the other. These small tracts are 60 miles away from T. V. A., and obviously were deliberately purchased to prevent the Aluminum Co. from building its largest dam and to wreck its whole program. What American citizen will give his sanction to such nefarious practice? Will such perfidy maintain the confidence of the people in the integrity of government? What lover of liberty will countenance the blackjack methods of such brutal tyranny?

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. Not now.

Mr. Chairman, because of my limited time there are many aspects of this problem which I cannot discuss today. I should like to point out in detail how the T. V. A.'s expenditures have far exceeded its estimates, and how its revenues have fallen woefully and pitifully short of its calculations. Perhaps those in charge of affairs are capable men, but it is difficult for a "hill billy" from a great dairying district in the Ozarks to understand why the T. V. A. would pay $372 per head for 25 dairy cattle a year ago, when the best sold in my district at that time for $20 a head. I will not trifle with the jamming of cash registers at T. V. A. which accounts for shortages. I want to quote only one paragraph from the Comptroller General's report concerning disbursement exceptions:

> The nature of exceptions established consisted of purchases without competition in violation of section 3709 Revised Statutes; emergency purchases unsupported by showing of emergency; modification of specifications; awards on basis of personal preference; dual compensation; excessive allowances and reimbursement of traveling expenses to prospective employees; payment of per diem at designated posts of duty; allowance of overtime to annual employees; allowance of charge for personally owned motor vehicles without prior authorization; overpayment on pay rolls; payment of pay rolls without administrative approval; subscription to newspapers and periodicals in excess of statutory limitations; payment for rented office equipment lost or stolen; payment for power plants, transmission lines, and real estate acquired without having clear title thereto; rent for land occupied by Civilian Conservation Corps camps paid at rates higher than for land purchased outright; lump-sum payments under cost-plus contracts and fees without original invoices and in excess of reported progress of work; claims paid for loss and damage to property; apparent overpayments on electric equipment under annual agreements; cost of reconditioning plant agreed by contract to be for payment account of losses; rent for buildings without evidence showing that payments are not in excess of 15 percent of fair market value; pre-audited certified vouchers increased and payments made to vendors in excess of amounts shown on invoices; allowances in expense accounts for bridge toll ticket books before such books have been used; loans to cooperative associations without security; hire of special conveyances such as busses and aeroplanes for visitors and students; and noncompliance with contractural provisions for insurance protection covering personal injury.

This, in itself, is sufficient proof of such discrepancies that if the T. V. A. is not downright dishonest it is guilty of gross negligence, incompetence, and inefficiency. [Applause.]

Certainly I should like to see every family in the Tennessee Valley enjoy the benefits of electricity, but at their own expense and not at the expense of the taxpayers in my district. Certainly I should like to see every home in eastern Tennessee, whence my ancestors came and where many relatives now live, enjoy the blessings of Frigidaires, radios, electric irons, vacuum cleaners, and all other electrical appliances. But I pause to ask this question: If the T. V. A. can take public money out of the Federal Treasury, money from the people of Missouri, Illinois, Michigan, Pennsylvania, and other States, to use in the Tennessee Valley in the development of hydroelectric power, in destructive and cutthroat competition with already existing private companies which have developed the country and in which the people themselves have invested their earnings, and which now have more than an adequate supply of power for the present needs, what is there to prevent the Federal Government from starting shoe factories in St. Louis and Brockton to drive out of exisence private companies which now adequately serve the people? What is there to prevent the Federal Government from going to Detroit and operating a factory which will drive Henry Ford into bankruptcy? [Applause.]

This legislation, my friends, is false, fickle, flimsy, frivilous, and fraudulent. It is the opening wedge to state socialism, and since going over most of Russia in 1931 I must exclaim with the distinguished senior Senator from Virginia, Hon. CARTER GLASS, "My God! I am not surprised that we recognized Russia, but I am surprised that Russia recognized us." [Laughter and applause.]

If any Members feel constrained to vote for this legislation, which in my opinion is unwise, unsound, unconstitutional, and un-American, I hope they will vote for the House bill, for the House bill does curb the authority of these political parasites and dictatorial bureaucrats, whose greed for power is unlimited. The House bill provides that T. V. A. finances after July 1 next year will be subject to the same audit and control of the Comproller General as is imposed upon other Government agencies. No honest board could object to this provision. Furthermore, the House bill prohibits T. V. A. after July 1, 1937, from selling surplus power or chemicals below the cost of production. It likewise precludes duplication or construction of transmission lines paralleling those of existing privately owned companies. And, finally, it expressly forbids the T. V. A.'s acquiring lands not actually necessary to carry out plans and projects decided upon.

The Senate bill is impossible; and even with the improvement of the restrictions adopted by the Military Affairs Committee in the House bill, it is still bad. One cannot change the condition of a rotten egg. It can be fried, boiled, poached, or scrambled—but it still smells. [Laughter.] The original T. V. A. Act of May 18, 1933, should never have become law. Any attempt to improve it is like trying to graft healthy limbs or branches on the rotten trunk of a decaying tree. I am unalterably opposed to this legislation, because I feel it to be fundamentally wrong and basically unsound.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. I refuse to yield now, but I will yield after I get through.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman is reading his speech. He ought to be able to make one without reading it.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLARK of North Carolina). If the gentleman from Texas insists on his point of order, the Chair will put the question to the Committee whether the gentleman from Missouri shall be allowed to read his speech.

Mr. McFARLANE. If the gentleman will yield for a question, I will not insist on the point of order.

Mr. SHORT. I will yield to the gentleman after I am through. After the storm and the ship has been tossed hither and thither the mariner turns to his compass.

When this panic is over and the frantic moments of alarm are past, when we come out of our twilight sleep produced by new-deal lullabies, when we realize that Santa Clause will turn into Shylock to exact his pound of flesh for the gifts we now so freely receive, we shall then repent of the errors and blunders which we cowardly permit to be made today. Men will then be sent to Congress who will not display demagoguery by clothing themselves with righteousness and styling themselves "champions of the people." Paternalism will then cease and social regimentation will end. The individual will again be set free to live his own life, run his own business, do his own thinking, capable of regulating his own affairs, without governmental meddling or intervention. This is an American ideal, cherished by all patriots, regardless of party affiliations. No stronger words have been uttered on this particular point than the forceful language of former Democratic Senator, Hon. James A. Reed, of my own State.

I want to say for the benefit of my distinguished friend from Texas that this is my own speech, except this paragraph that I am about to quote.

Mr. McFARLANE. Who wrote it?

Mr. SHORT. Ex-Senator Reed.

> Governmental paternalism and individual liberty cannot exist at the same time. Paternalistic government is necessarily oppressive. For Government to bestow benefactions upon a part of the people, it must of necessity wrongfully take the property of the rest of the people. That is robbery! Or, for the Government to regulate the business, the lives, or habits of the people, it must substitute for the free will of the citizen the command of those clothed with temporary power. That is tyranny! Such was the prerogative asserted by kings and emperors. If these principles are unsound, then the teachings of the fathers of the Republic are false, man is incapable of self-government, and liberty is a foolish dream; but, if they are sound, it follows that paternalism cannot be tolerated in the opinion of a free people.

[Applause.]

I now yield to my friend from Texas.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman has admitted that he wrote the speech, I wonder how the gentleman could reconcile his position on this legislation with his known position on all other river and harbor legislation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 8 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, we have learned to comprehend the meaning of the new term "taking it." So, when the gentleman from Pennsylvania called upon me to make a few remarks, I am very glad to take my turn as a "pinch hitter." This whole debate has been a revival to me of a new window dressing of an old subject, very old. It had a remarkable champion here—that is, the Muscle Shoals proposition—in a former Member of this House, Judge Almon. Over a long period of years I admired his resolution and persistence and the final triumph of that fine old gentleman. I may be older than he was, but I think he grew old in appearance from the work that he did on this matter. What he did was this: He was able to carry this through on a point of merit. He so inveighled me into the matter that I was really enthusiastic about the idea that some of the farmers up my way, and in fact every way, were going to get some nitrates, and that we were going to contribute immensely to the success of the World War. Instead of that, we find the old story here just the same. Instead of producing nitrates, and instead of producing even anything, they are coming back here, returning, asking for more money.

I should like to have a few more minutes than the 2 or 3 that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has given me, because I should like to talk about several matters. For instance, there is our good friend Mr. RANKIN, who is obsessed with an idea. His idea is all right, but it does not apply here. This is not the place for the regulation of the rates of electricity for farmers out in the country or for your homes in the city. The gentleman from Mississippi is right in that rates should be regulated, but that is not what you are doing here, not even confiscating.

You are going to take the money, no matter how much, of the reserve wealth of America, which your grandfathers and mine laid away for the day of resistance against an outside attack. Mr. James G. Blaine once said to me, "Young man, we will not have a foreign war; we will have no war unless it comes from within." You are taking the reserve wealth that has been accumulated by the industrial States, if you please, and you are applying it to the production of something which will consume that very industry that gives you the money to exist. That, if it is nothing else, at least is unethical. You do this because you have the power through the vote and the President to put it over. I have looked this over for 10 or 12 years, and I actually voted for it originally on the representation made by the gentleman from Alabama, Judge Almon, that it was going to be of some benefit to the country. I do not know how much electricity they have in Mississippi, or how much this might supply them down there, but as for the rest of the country, you can go anywhere and find the farmer's house illuminated as well as his stable and barnyard with electric lights, and he is not overcharged for it.

So much power can be generated by a small dam that every power plant on the Susquehanna and the Juniata produced more than is needed, and even the Ontario Power Co., with the Great Trust Co. of Ontario back of it, had to be liquidated and refinanced. That is how much you can make. In other words, you are going to create down here something that you do not need. We have energy enough in the mountains of Pennsylvania, and in fact every township west of the Susquehanna River on through to Ohio and West Virginia and Kentucky will find energy enough to satisfy their communities. In Montana there is a seam of coal so great that the hydroelectric engineers have told me it would take 10,000,000 years for this population to consume it. So why come along at this time for this extra appropriation? I thought by this time you would have everything in operation and that the money would be returning to the Federal Government. Instead of that you are reaching out for more and more. I say to my friends from the South that there are plenty of rivers in the Carolinas that will supply all the power you want. I have friends who put a hydroelectric plant in those rivers, and you have them in the West. Let this go down into your hearts and souls, let your intellect respond to this. This is not a partisan matter—this is common sense.

When I first came here we heard nothing much else but "pork barrel" for the Mississippi River, the wasting of money to lift the bottom of the Mississippi River up to prevent the floods that came sweeping down there devastating untold millions of acres of land. Take this money, my friends; let this subject alone, since you do not need it, but in the name of mercy go out on those rivers that are tributary to that great Father of Waters and put in the small dams to resist and restrain this water and you will create the greatest empire that was ever known in all the world, the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.] You have neglected it. You are neglecting it now. You will owe some penalty to someone if you pass a bill like this today and waste this money when there is such great need for it to save the lives and treasure that are out there in the Mississippi Valley. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT] has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL]

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennesee. Mr. Chairman, we have listened this afternoon to some rather remarkable discussions and arguments. I see no reason why we may not discuss this great problem freely and fairly, without prejudice or bias, and undertake to arrive as legislators at a proper solution of a great national question. There should not be anything sectional about it, with all due respect to my Republican friends who have spoken. I live in the great State of Tennessee but 75 miles from the nearest point that is involved in the construction of any of these dams. My Republican friend from east Tennessee has represented Knoxville and the Second Congressional District for many years. If there is any particular party politics in it the Republican Party, speaking as far as narrow partisanship is concerned, would be largely the beneficiaries of any development in east Tennessee at or near Norris, Tenn.

What are we doing here, and why this great question pending before Congress today? I want to say to my Republican friends and my Democratic colleagues that I do not defend unnecessary expenditure of the people's money. I want honest administration of every act that is put in force by this Congress. We are carrying on a great constructive proposition started during the World War at Muscle Shoals. About $150,000,000 of the people's money was invested in Muscle Shoals, and in the Seventy-third and Seventy-fourth Congresses we fell heir to the proper administration of that fund to try to save it from salvage and wreckage.

Then why all this noise about what the Congress is trying to do? We seek to improve living conditions not only in Tennessee, my native State, not only in Kentucky, Alabama, and Georgia, but alike in 48 States of this great Union. [Applause.] What are we seeking to do? We are seeking to improve navigation on a great river that reaches 650 miles through these different States to which I have referred. I am here to tell you that what I want to urge on this Congress, and I speak to you as one sworn as you are, that I believe we need to deepen the channel of this great river. [Applause.] I believe we need to construct more dams for the purpose of flood control and navigation in that section of the Southland. I do not think of the South in a narrow partisan sense, because what affects the South affects the North. There is no longer any North, South, East, or West, but ours is a common people, a common cause, and a common destiny in which we are interested. [Applause.] What is the purpose of government? It is to render the greatest service to the greatest number of people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL] has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 additional minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. MITCHELL of Tennessee. I thank the gentleman very much.

We are interested, my colleagues, if you want to put it on a commercial basis, although I would not cheapen it that way, because we build for the future, and we owe much to the present and we owe a debt to those who have gone before us, but what we need to do is to stress flood control, navigation, and the yardstick to know what the price of electricity should be in America. I am not interested in defending the Aluminum Co. or any of the other trusts that come here. I only want to help the common men in America. [Applause.] If there have been mistakes made by those gentlemen who are administering this trust, let him who is without sin cast the first stone. Perfection does not come here below. It comes after a while. If the administrators have wrongfully expended money, I do not condone that. I would not say I would advocate the building of the towns and the many things that have been done, but I would not destroy the temple, because, perchance, there is a defective plank here and there in the building. Let us be fair about it. Let us be liberal and magnanimous. I hope we are liberal toward this great proposition. I am against the Power Trust. I am against the Fertilizer Trust.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MITCHELL] has again expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK].

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I was impressed more by a speech made on this floor than by any other speech I have heard since I have been in Congress. That was the speech by the gentleman from Texas, Hon. EWING THOMASON. I believe the gentleman from Texas, my distinguished and able colleague, hit the nail on the head throughout his speech and gave all the necessary discussion of this question. His people back home should be proud of him, as well as the people of the Nation. All I can say is I believe every word Mr. THOMASON said in that speech, and I adopt his remarks as mine, if he will agree, as I feel unable to cover the subject as well as he.

Mr. THOMASON is one of the ablest leaders of my State, and I hope that as I take on a few more years I can develop his insight, ability, and character.

If only we all understood what he said, it would not be necessary for you to listen to me, because in spirit he has given the best explanation of the T. V. A., and has met the issues face to face.

Although I am really only interested in the economic issues involved in the T. V. A., I desire now to mention a few of the political angles of this subject, as well as some others we face. We Democrats split up on the holding company bill, as we had a perfect right to do. The Democrats who voted against the so-called "death sentence" voted for what they believed were the best interests of their stockholders back home. I did not happen to vote that way, having a different viewpoint, but others did, and they had a right to vote as they pleased. But in the case of the pending bill, however, we face an issue which belongs to the Democratic Party, which belongs to our people, and not only to all the Democrats but all the American people. The Tennessee Valley Authority is our measure; it is a measure in which we should have pride. The gentleman from Missouri referred to the "brutal tyranny of the T. V. A.", talked about "blackjack methods", and then referred to "the diseased and disordered brains of the new deal."

The new deal belongs to us; it does not belong to the Republican Party; and I feel that we more or less ought to stand together; that we ought not to admit that our brains are completely disordered. If we vote as the Republicans tell us on this issue, especially when we have the meritorious side, the truth of their statements might be suspected. I think we ought to stand together on this and certainly against these Republicans who say they are absolutely opposed to the whole T. V. A. and the philosophy of the Government behind it. We are either for this bill or against it.

The Republican minority report says frankly that they are opposed to the whole idea, the whole philosophy of government expressed in the act, and are, therefore, opposed to it in toto. They say in their minority report, no. 1372, Military Affairs Committee, page 37:

The philosophies, theories, and premises underlying the policy of this act which were dictated as a part of the program of the present administration are now well known to the American people generally. * * *

We do not now, nor have we ever, subscribed to the philosophies of government upon which the act now sought to be amended was based, and, therefore, would be opposed to the passage of the original measure were it before the House of Representatives today.

Now, as I said, I am in favor of the philosophy behind this act, and the original act says, in section 22:

* * * all for the general purpose of fostering an orderly and proper physical, economic, and social development of said areas; and the President is further authorized in making said surveys and plans to cooperate with the States affected thereby, or subdivisions or agencies of such States, or with cooperative or other organizations, and to make such studies, experiments, or demonstrations as may be necessary and suitable to that end.

And in the next section, which is section 23, it says:

The President shall, from time to time, as the work provided for in the preceding section progresses, recommend to Congress such legislation as he deems proper to carry out the general purposes stated in said section, and for the especial purpose of bringing about in said Tennessee drainage basin and adjoining territory in conformity with said general purposes:

(1) the maximum amount of flood control;

(2) the maximum development of said Tennessee River for navigation purposes;

(3) the maximum generation of electric power consistent with flood control and navigation;

(4) the proper use of marginal lands;

(5) the proper method of reforestation of all lands in said drainage basin suitable for reforestation; and

(6) the economic and social well-being of the people living in said river basin.

The purposes of the T. V. A. Act are very well set out and yet the ramifications of it and the wide-spread, coordinated benefits are not to be realized by those words alone.

On yesterday the able gentleman from Alabama, fellow member and vice chairman of the Military Affairs Committee [Mr. HILL], stated he expected to offer certain amendments. I believe that if we are going to have this bill at all we should have it in a proper and decent form, so that we really accomplish something for our country. The four amendments to be offered by the gentleman from Alabama are to be found on page 10791 of yesterday's RECORD, dated July 8, 1935, and I ask every Member to read them, because we want to bring out as perfect a piece of legislation as possible. I hope we will enact an effective bill and accept these amendments.

One of these amendments relates to surplus power. I am not going into that, because it is fully covered in today's issue of the RECORD. It is the first amendment that deals with surplus power. Then the gentleman from Alabama intends to offer an amendment which will do away with hindrance of the purposes of the T. V. A. by obstruction of litigation by the power companies of the country, and which will eliminate the litigation that would really ruin the T. V. A. program.

The second amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Alabama deals with the Comptroller General. They say that the Tennessee Valley Authority is contemptuous of Congress, contemptuous of this Republican Comptroller General, Mr. McCarl. That is not true; anyhow, the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Alabama is fair, it is wide, it is comprehensive, and it fully protects the rights of the Federal Government and it is a 100-percent check on the T. V. A. by the Comptroller General. Were any of us operating a business—and this really is a business, even though it concerns the welfare of the people—we would want the managers to have the necessary latitude in order that they can conduct the business in a fair and proper manner, without unnecessary restrictions. Let me remind you that the amendment to be offered provides for constant auditing by the Comptroller General.

The third amendment deals with transmission lines; and then the fourth refers to the Aluminum Co., which owns property in the little Tennessee Valley. I never thought that even a Republican would champion the cause of Andy Mellon as against the people of the United States. I have nothing against Andy, but this amendment to be offered merely subjects the Aluminum Co. to reasonable regulations. We heard described the modesty and humility of this Aluminum man who came before the Military Affairs Committee, that he was the representative of Andy Mellon, and that he was not a "brain truster"; yet we remember with what contempt our Republican brethren spoke of the Democratic Party and of those who were in favor of the T. V. A. The humility of this gentleman from the Aluminum Co. of America—someone praising Andy Mellon!—oh, well, that is something new in American politics; it is new for a Republican openly to praise Andy Mellon and to speak of the humility of his agents. It sickens one at the stomach.

I ask you to read and study these four amendments which will be offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], which are fundamental and which we ought to adopt. If we are not going to adopt these amendments, we should kill the bill; kill it and let the $100,000,000, more or less, we have spent on T. V. A. wash down the river and disappear; yes—let there be floods, and let our farms wash and blow away, and abjectly surrender to the special interests. No; we cannot do it! We must not only have the program, but make it better and wider in its scope.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. No; I would rather not yield. You Republicans have lots of time, but I have not.

Mr. Chairman, the T. V. A. is a national program. It concerns soil-erosion control and all of the things that have been brought up here this afternoon. Some say it is socialism, some say it is communism, that this is a terrible and wicked thing that we are doing down there. In reply, I ask: Will the Aluminum Co. of America carry out a reforestation program; has it a reforestation program? Is it going to stop soil erosion and provide for the general welfare? Is it possible to leave to private business those functions of governments? Why, it is absolutely impossible. Is the Aluminum Co. or any utility company or private corporation doing anything in the way of preserving all of that territory that concerns six or seven States? Why, certainly not; and they cannot; it is not their legal or moral duty to carry on functions of government, nor can they be expected to.

Do you know that in 50 years vast portions of this country will be washed away, that it will flow away and wash away unless we adopt measures which are constructive and which conserve our natural resources? We have got to do this through the Federal Government; and this authority transcends State lines, concerns national flood control, navigation, and defense.

Yes; I say again the T. V. A. is a great national program. What is being done down there to save the soil for the people, to prevent floods from washing us out, to make rivers navigable, and put the power that is in the water to the use of the people, can be done all over the United States; can be done in any congressional district we represent. That is why T. V. A. is so important. This agency, created by Congress, is working out in a concrete way the methods of tackling these national problems. The methods that they are developing down there will be shared with all the rest of the country. If you let the enemies of this program hamstring, smear, and strangle it at this stage of the game, then there is no chance of having this same kind of program applied to other districts to meet the same kind of problems of the land, the water, and of power that affect the American people in their everyday life.

If T. V. A. were only for the benefit of these six or seven States, then maybe those of you who come from Texas, Iowa, Connecticut, Washington, and other States might not be so enthusiastic about it, but do not forget this is a national program, a national project. The Tennessee Valley is just the proving ground in which the methods are being worked out. Of course, it will benefit the valley States immediately, but the real point of the T. V. A. program is that it is going to share these benefits with every section of the country.

You see, the Republicans have now become "grass rooters", but they openly oppose the prevention of soil erosion; they do not favor protection of the soil, flood control, reforestation, or the proper use of marginal lands. They demand all this be stopped. If we Democrats keep the grass growing by not letting the soil wash away—and by having fine grass—the roots will take care of themselves and we will walk into office on the greensward and our Republican brethren shall be swallowed up in clouds of dust and of locusts. Yea, verily, Of course, I speak of the Republican minority report; I do not know whether it represents the whole party or not. All Republicans, however, who believe in conservation, who prefer self-respecting work to a dole, and who think self-liquidating projects are better than money wasted are invited to vote for the bill and certain amendments that will be offered.

I will admit that the issue is power, but are we to go ahead and construct flood-control projects, navigation projects, and dams and let the water wash over and waste all that power? This would be nonsense; worse, to do so would be utterly criminal; we would be wasting the people's money. The reason this is a great program is because it has self-liquidating features, at least as to the power phase, and we can get some of our money back. They can call it any kind of "ism" they want to, they can rattle the bones of our ancestors and call on Thomas Jefferson, who would not recognize a lot of people who use his name in vain, but that is not the answer to our problem. When our forefathers came to this continent they had at their command illimitable natural resources. When they were robbed out of one place they went to another; and, of course, the migration has always been westward. What has happened in this country? Resources are now in the hands of a few people, a few corporations. For instance, in the little Tennessee River territory these resources are in the hands of the Aluminum Co. We do not propose to take away the rights of the Aluminum Co.; all we want, as I said before, is reasonable regulation and coordination for prevention of floods.

Yes; our resources are in the hands of these few people; but I believe the American people are entitled to the water and the land, and the strictly natural resources, if nothing else.

What is proposed to be accomplished by this bill? It is proposed to protect the interests of the American people in these six or seven States; to reduce electric rates; to preserve and fertilize their farms; to prevent floods—and this program will eventually be national, and is even now becoming a great national asset.

It proposes to set up a yardstick; it proposes really doing something of a definite and constructive nature for the American people. It is not like spending relief money and not getting anything back when you have spent it. This is something that is building up our country and something in which we ought to have pride. The money spent for and in the Tennessee Valley is for self-respecting, hard, honorable, constructive work.

Mr. Chairman, they talk about the constitutionality of this bill. I do not believe there is any doubt about the constitutionality of the bill at all. Its various functions have been pursued under the Constitution for generations in other endeavors. This is a proper function and duty of the American Government. The statement has been made that when this was first started it was an experiment. Of course; but it is not now. It is not itself an experiment, having already proved successful in its main objectives, although they are carrying on experiments down there all the time, just the same as General Motors or other great corporations, not for the profit of a certain group of individuals but for the benefit of all business men, farmers, chambers of commerce, organizations, and citizens of the United States of America. These are a few of the benefits of the T. V. A. Then, as I said before, it is a self-liquidating proposition. [Laughter.] Mr. Stenographer, put down in the RECORD there were three Republicans who laughed and thought that statement was funny—three friends of the special interests and the power companies, men who are so superficial as to yammer and giggle in the consideration of so serious a matter.

Mr. McLEAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I have not the time to yield, and I do not want any of the gentleman's time.

Mr. McLEAN. Does not the gentleman think it is funny to think about this as being self-liquidating?

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I did not yield to the gentleman, so I want to be given credit for an extra minute or two, but his question may be left in the RECORD. But, I think it serious, not humorous, and view my duty as such. It has been shown in long tables of figures that the power program will be self-liquidating and will give cheap and abundant power to millions of people.

Now, a slaughterhouse has sense enough to use the byproducts of a cow or bull. We ought to have sense enough to use the byproducts of water as it goes over a dam. I most respectfully suggest that Congress ought to have that much sense; we should observe, at least, the practices of butchers—save our byproducts—but let us not butcher our own program.

Permit me to say another thing. The statement has been made that this was started as a national-defense measure. I am not willing to go to war and kill off our young men just to prove that this is a matter of national defense. We have better use for our nitrates. Let us use them to fertilize the fields of peace instead of the fields of war with the bodies of our people. I think one of the best forms of national defense is to have a clean, decent, well-clothed, and well-educated group of human beings with plenty to eat living in this country. Then they have something to really fight for. This will constitute the best form of national defense; and if we have to go to war with any nation we will have a strong people to do the fighting, who in the meantime have preserved their natural resources.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAVERICK. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman referred to the speech made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT]. I think his description of the rotten egg, which whether fried, scrambled, or boiled is still a rotten egg and smells to high heaven, was the best description of the Republican Party of which the gentleman is the sole representative from the great State of Missouri that has ever been uttered on this floor.

Mr. MAVERICK. I think his description of the Republican Party was very good. It is scrambled hopelessly and can never be unscrambled. Let us Democrats be progressive, look out for the rights of the people, and not get ourselves off the right track.

Before I close let me mention those cows and cash registers and typewriters and other things which the enemies of T. V. A. seek to magnify. Our critics look with horror on the purchase of a few cows at high prices. As I have said before, this is nothing but gnat-slapping, fly-swatting, and just ordinary tick-picking. This criticism is not worthy of men who understand the greatness of this project. It is an infinitesimal item as far as cost is concerned, but personally I do not see why the South should not proceed to raise the level of its herds, as has been done in Wisconsin and Minnesota. I am glad that the Wisconsin and Minnesota delegations are nearly all for this project, although they know it will improve the breed of cattle in the South.

My colleagues will not forget that T. V. A. was begun in June of 1933, when it had three employees and a gigantic job to handle. In less than 2 years it had 16,000 employees and had one dam three-fourths finished, a second dam half finished, and a third dam well begun. It had built a new fertilizer plant which has produced 35,000 tons of a brand-new kind of cheap phosphate fertilizer and had planted hundreds of thousands of trees, prevented soil erosion on thousands of acres of land. The American people demanded action and they got it. This is one governmental activity that is a 100-percent success. Here is one agency that has worked successfully, accomplishing substantial results, with more to follow, and how anyone can stand here and talk about cash registers and other picayune things, I cannot see. It is like bawling out a general who has won a great victory against the enemy because some of his men do not have their buttons polished nor their hair combed according to rules and regulations.

There have been mistakes in the T. V. A., of course. Some mistakes of policy, a few errors here and there, but I am astonished by the fact of its high purpose and the few real errors that have been made in comparing it with ordinary business, especially some of the big ones; the comparison is very favorable.

Let us sum up a little the T. V. A. It is the greatest project in America, comparable to many others, but on the whole I believe the greatest. It will become, if we give it sympathetic consideration, self-liquidating and will hurt no individual and no business. It will help in national defense—I mean in peace as well as for the war that I hope will never come; it will provide a higher standard of living for the people of six or seven States directly, known as the "Tennessee Valley"—probably 6,000,000 people—and indirectly, by example, and directly later by similar projects, to all the people of the United States. It will improve the condition directly of 26,000,000 acres of farm lands; it will dam our rivers, save millions of dollars each year on flood control, and numberless human lives; have ordinary agricultural conservation of resources and fertilization of lands for better crops. It will provide cheap hydroelectric power, giving a return to the Government and some leisure to millions of overburdened people.

And the South will be proud of this great achievement—and the North will be proud, I think, of the South—and all the Nation—North, South, East, and West—will be proud of similar great projects; we will have national pride in our unified endeavor.

Why waste power when we can use it? I doubt if our platform suggested the wasting of power or if any such thing was ever suggested by Thomas Jefferson.

I have no idea what Thomas Jefferson said on hydroelectric power, for all the people knew of electricity in those days was a key sent to the sky by Benjamin Franklin; but I do know that Thomas Jefferson was in favor not only of technical scientific advance, but in favor of political scientific advance; that he always opposed monopolies, ignorance, intolerance, and greed; among other things, he favored great cooperative movements for proper farming and soil conservation. Again I have not the intuitive ability of some of my friends, and do not know exactly the mental reaction of Thomas Jefferson, for he is dead. I think he would like, however, to see this project and would like to stand on the highest dam of them all and explain what he meant by saying: "Those least governed are the best governed." For, undoubtedly, he meant, as he surely did, that if men had the resources to work with as they did then, and have not now, and as is possible under this bill for the return of the resources to the people, that few laws will be needed to regulate men's morals or keep them from committing crimes, because if they are working on dignified and honorable projects, such as this—and not on the dole, hopelessly watching their country wash away—that few laws will be necessary to regulate their lives.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PEARSON].

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Chairman, we are to take up for consideration today the bill reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs pertaining to Tennessee Valley Authority. There is no matter of more importance to my district or as a matter of fact to the people of the United States than this Government agency and its welfare. For 6 months I have served as a member of this body and up to the present time out of deference to those whom I felt were better qualified to speak authoritatively on matters of public concern I have not undertaken to inject my personal views into the many illuminating and instructive debates which have taken place on the floor of the House. I call your attention to this in order that you may know that only a matter which is of impelling interest and importance to my people would cause me now to abandon my early resolve to serve my apprenticeship as a legislator as a good listener rather than one who might appear to be an ill advised or poorly informed debater.

I happen to represent a district that lies wholly within the trade area known as the Tennessee Valley. In fact the Tennessee River touches as many counties and affects as much, if not more, territory in my district than it does of any other Member of this Congress. The Tennessee River is the eastern boundary line of my district from the southern border of Kentucky to the northern boundary of Mississippi, across the full width of the State of Tennessee.

I know something of the history of this river and the Tennessee Valley, something of the hardships which the people who love that region and who have spent their lives there trying to earn a living have suffered, and I share with them the dream of hope which the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority 2 years ago brought to them, and the fruition of which is not far distant if we can command a sympathetic ear from each of you who is in a position to assist in the completion and consummation of the ambitious program which lies ahead. Every Member of this Congress who is interested in the conservation, the utilization, and development of the natural water power in this Nation should be interested in the continuance of the Tennessee Valley Authority and in giving it unhampered and unrestricted power and authority to exploit and harness the hitherto sleeping potential power of Tennessee. It is blazing a trail and chartering a course for future conservation of the natural water powers of America, and every section of our Nation will some day enjoy the blessings and benefits which will naturally follow from such experimental activities.

It is a matter of considerable disappointment to me that the Committee on Military Affairs failed to take favorable action on what is known as the "Norris bill", or Senate bill 2357, calculated to clarify and define the rights, duties, and powers of the Authority and give it an opportunity to proceed with its work in an orderly way and to accomplish its ultimate objectives. I have no quarrel to invoke with or criticism of the members of that committee who were unwilling to support this bill. I think they are absolutely sincere in their position, but I am convinced that some of them are laboring under a misapprehension as to the aims and purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority, and particularly as to the effect which its program will have on certain private industries.

I regretted very much that in the recent debate on the holding-company bill the opponents of the bill passed by the Senate to regulate holding companies in the utilities field, and which was sought to be substituted for the House bill, based their attack upon it on the assumption that the Government, in creating the T. V. A. and utilizing the water power of the Tennessee River, was proceeding in a manner inimicable to the welfare of privately owned power companies. This is in deed and in truth an erroneous assumption and, except to the extent that it will require power companies to deal honestly and fairly with those whom they serve, it is an argument without justification or foundation. I want to disabuse your minds, if I can, of the belief that the expansion of the program of the Tennessee Valley Authority is going to seriously injure private industry and eliminate at the outset from the consideration of the bill before us any such misleading argument.

We hope and expect to amend the bill now being considered so as to accomplish something for T. V. A. rather than "hamstring and hogtie" its activities, as is sought to be done by the bill brought out by the committee in lieu of the Norris or Senate bill. The only possible reason for not so amending it is the time-worn argument that the Government of the United States is, by reason of its sponsoring T. V. A., strangling and impeding private industry, namely, the power companies. I say to you unhesitatingly and unequivocally that this is not true, and my statement is based upon facts, not upon hearsay, rumor, or biased opinion.

In the first place, the Authority is dealing fairly with all competitive companies affected by its program and in no instance has it taken advantage of a single company, either in the matter of fair rates or in negotiations for privately owned properties. The fact is that the principle of reasonable rates for electric energy, which T. V. A. as the trustee of the people in the sale of the public property placed in its hands, has and is insisting upon, has proved to be beneficial to the privately owned power companies as well as their consumer customers. This is not a theory; it is a result. I cite one concrete example. One of the largest power companies doing business in the Tennessee Valley is the Tennessee Electric Power Co. Of all the companies one might mention I think it is the one affected the most by the program of T. V. A. If this program is destructive or its policies ruinous, this company should and would be the first to realize it. In January 1934 this company entered into a contract with the Authority which provided, among other things, that the company would reduce its rates for electric energy approximately 20 percent. At that time this reduction was thought to be unfair and unjust and the company was loath to make such an agreement. The results were amazing. During the year beginning May 1934 and ending May 1935 this same company became known as the leading utility company in the entire country in the opinion of men who understood the business of the utility. During the spring of 1935 the Edison Electric Institute awarded this company the medal for the finest record made in the United States during that year's operation.

Practically the entire loss in its revenues accruing as a result of the reduction of its rates was recovered during this one year. The net result of the reduction was an unprecedented increase in the consumption of power and an increase in the use of electrical equipment. It is estimated that more electrical equipment was installed by its customers than those of any other company in the history of the country in a similar period of time. The consumers of that company accepted the reduction in the usual and expected way. There was an increase of 200 kilowatt-hours per year per customer, as compared with an average increase per customer throughout the industry of about 35 kilowatt-hours per year. And so in the language of one of the directors of T. V. A.:

> Here again in the case of a private utility you have the same principle of the T. V. A. yardstick at work, and while the rates of the company are not as low as the T. V. A. rates, you have in a considerable measure the same kind of benefits—benefits to consumers in greatly increased use of electricity and electric equipment; benefits in the stimulation of industry in a remarkable demand for those durable goods; and, finally, benefit to the utility in maintaining its gross revenues and broadening the base of its business by developing greater use by a greater number of consumers.
> The time has come when the controversy about electric rates should cease on the ground of theory. The test of the T. V. A. principle is a test of results. And the results prove that the T. V. A. plan works.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the T. V. A. has been in existence a little over 2 years and it has reached a crucial point in its history. The attitude of this Congress may determine the success or failure of its efforts, and I wish I had Paul's power of persuasion in presenting the merits of the case to the membership of the House to the end that they might see the situation as I do.

The Authority was created for the fourfold purpose of promoting the national defense, agricultural and industrial development, improved navigation of the Tennessee River, and control of the destructive flood waters of the Tennessee and Mississippi Basin. The value of its work in matters of national defense can only be determined when the unhappy occasion arises. I think, then, its usefulness in this respect will justify its existence, although I sincerely hope its psychological effect will prove more useful in preventing a war than its aid in winning one. It is already proving its worth in aiding agricultural and industrial development, and if permitted to proceed uninterrupted in its great human program the Tennessee River will be open to full navigation for the benefit of all of the Middle and South Atlantic States and the perennial menace of overflows, dealing death and destruction, will be a thing which the present and future generations may be permitted to forget.

The time is not far distant when it is going to be the means of the rural electrification of all the countryside in the valley. Already it is bringing relief to many in this respect. Let me tell you of just one instance. Down in one small county on the river there are many farms within calling distance of Wilson Dam and throughout the years the water has gone over the dam while the occupants of these farms lived by the light of coal-oil lamps or in darkness and faced every day the many unpleasant drudgeries of farm life, not knowing that a few miles away was being wasted every 24 hours enough power to bring to them many of the luxuries of life if it were utilized. In all the valley 2 percent of farms have electricity and in all United States only 10 percent have it. The T. V. A. sought to aid them. They sent out 185 questionnaires to as many farmers and received 185 answers. These answers were from dirt farmers, not city dwellers farming by proxy—just ordinary farmers. Their desire for aid brought electric lines to them. Out of this group 148 today are using electric irons, 142 radios, 34 electric refrigerators, 26 water pumps, 13 electric stoves, 76 water heaters. They wired their homes, installed plumbing, grist mills, tool grinders, and so forth. In short they have been enabled to better their conditions, and to make of their homes no matter how humble veritable palaces of happiness and pleasure. We have waited ever since Franklin flew his kite for private dispensers to make it possible for people far removed from larger centers to enjoy these comforts. It finally remained for this Government through T. V. A. to do the job.

The authority of T. V. A. to complete this task has been challenged by a recent decision of a United States district judge of Alabama. Its future in view of this decision hangs in the balance and in order to protect the investment of $50,000,000 already made to meet the decision and give it powers which the original act creating it did not expressly give, I appeal to every Member of this House who has a sympathetic interest in the farmers of America, a kindred feeling for suffering victims of the uncontrollable overflows of our great rivers, and for the millions who are looking to us to see to it that they be permitted to enjoy the comforts which can only be found in the use of electrical current and equipment at reasonable rates to help us in adopting the provisions of the Norris bill and defeating the bill as written and reported by the House Committee on Military Affairs. The bill in its present form will make matters worse than if we enact no bill at all. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. MERRITT], a member of the committee.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from New York 5 minutes.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I happen to be one of the 13 Members who voted a favorable report on this bill under the able guidance of our distinguished chairman, and I wish to take this opportunity of saying it has been a pleasure for me to serve on this committee under such a fine gentleman as my colleague from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN]. [Applause.]

I may say, Mr. Chairman, I do not own any public utility stocks. However, I am interested in this bill to the extent that there are some amendments that should be inserted in the bill in order to make it the kind of Tennessee Valley Authority we expect it to be. One amendment in particular is one that will finally put the Tennessee Valley Authority under the jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office. I sincerely trust that when the proper time comes an amendment will be offered to strike out "1936" in line 16, on page 12, and insert "1938."

My experience before coming to Congress proves to me that putting this under the jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office would certainly tie up the things we are trying to do for the benefit of everyone in this country of ours. If you had to replace a $12 shovel it would be necessary to get three bids, submit them to Washington and send them back with a bid that would be acceptable to the Authority and to the administration here. This in itself would certainly mean a loss of time.

I sincerely hope that the committee will give this matter very serious thought, to the end that this great project may be carried out to its finest fulfillment.

I am sorry I must disagree with a member of the committee, the gentleman from Missouri, in regard to national defense and, Mr. Chairman, for fear that some member of the committee may prevent me from reading something I ask unanimous consent to read an extract from the hearings held before the Military Affairs Committee during its consideration of this Tennessee Valley Authority measure.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLARK of North Carolina). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. This statement was made by Dr. Morgan, of the Tennessee Valley Authority, at the time I asked him something about national defense. I think national defense is of the utmost importance in connection with the Tennessee Valley, and I am quoting from Dr. Morgan's testimony:

Dr. MORGAN. There are several respects in which the work of the Tennessee Valley Authority corresponds or is in line with work for national defense.

Nitrate plant no. 2 was a war-constructed and war-developed proposition. We are now, as directed in the act, keeping that in stand-by condition, so that it can be used at any time.

We are developing phosphates. Phosphates are a staple war material, and there is this about phosphates, about fertilizer feeds used generally, that farming can go without them for a few years; that is, it is a kind of production that can be stopped for domestic use at any time and put to other use, and we are developing two methods of phosphate production, especially with this in view, that the phosphate fields of that area have a relatively small amount of high-grade phosphate and a relatively large amount of low-grade phosphate that is generally destroyed in the process of production, or ignored.

We are working out methods of producing phosphorus from those low-grade phosphate rocks. There is at least 10 times as much of this low-grade phosphate as there is of the high grade, and if we work out that method we will very greatly increase the phosphate resources of that region, and for whatever use they are to be put to, and, as I say, phosphorus is a thing that you could take out of domestic use entirely for a year or two without any calamity. There would be a gradual deterioration of farm values, however.

Now, we are also exploring that region for new phosphate beds, and we have found phosphate deposits that require different treatment from the standard class, and we are working at the character of that and at the chemical processes necessary to develop them.

Then we are making a study of the mineral resources of that region, that will make us less dependent upon other nations. About 90 percent of the manganese used in this country comes from abroad. Manganese is as essential in steel construction almost as iron itself, and yet we get 90 percent of our manganese from other countries, from Russia and Brazil.

We have in this region some hundreds of deposits, 300 or 400 deposits of manganese. During the war they were operated to some extent, but few of them were known.

Our geologists are going over that country and locating these deposits, and making a study of their character and of how to reduce those manganese ores.

We think that some of them we can use under even present competitive conditions, and produce manganese from them, but a large number of them are scarcely on a level, when you consider economy of production, with those that we can get from the outside, but we are locating the deposits, and we are developing the power with which those deposits can be reduced to manganese, and we have got the whole set-up working today, so that if at any time the manganese supply should be cut off from the United States, we could quickly open up these deposits and make the United States nearly independent of other regions in the matter of manganese.

[Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS].

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I appreciate very much the time the gentleman from South Carolina has given me in this discussion. I did not want to take any time from the members of the Committee, but for the moment they seem not to be present. There is no one more interested in this great project than I am, and also the members of the delegation from Tennessee.

There are three men from our State who have not had the opportunity to participate in the general debate, and I speak for them; that is, our worthy Speaker [applause], the gentleman who sits in front of me [Mr. CHANDLER], and also the Honorable JERE COOPER.

I am surprised that men in this debate especially opposed to this proposition have shown the feeling that they have, and especially those on the Republican side.

I was surprised at my good friend from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] on yesterday. I say my good friend, and I am his friend. I told him today that he got so hot that he was really impudent to us. I do not know what stirred him up so much, except what he said here on the floor the other day, and that was that it might spoil the coal interests in his district.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. I want to say that anything my friend the gentleman from Tennessee says, or anything that may occur will never mar my friendship, love, and respect for the gentleman from Tennessee.

I would like to say this: I am not opposed to the development of the Tennessee River for the constitutional functions of the Federal Government. I am still for that, and I want to see it navigable from the head to the mouth.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I appreciate very much what the gentleman says and assure him that I have the same feeling for him. But the gentleman is afraid that it will spoil the coal interests in his district.

Mr. MAY. I am. Every time you produce 10 kilowatts of electricity you put out of business two coal men.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am not alarmed about the coal business; neither is the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR]. We represent districts that have more coal mines than any other districts in the State of Tennessee.

This is an administration measure, and had it not been for the administration your coal mines, in my opinion, would have been closed today [applause] and your miners would have been on the relief rolls.

I rather think that these are selfish interests. It is that spirit that says, "I want my people especially protected, but I do not want yours aided."

My friend from Kentucky reminds me of the old man who got down to pray, and he said, "O Lord, bless me and my wife, my son John and his wife, us four, and no more." [Laughter.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am sorry, but I have not the time. Mr. Chairman, this is in rather a peculiar situation. No one has fought harder for the development of the Tennessee River and this legislation than the chairman of this committee [Mr. McSWAIN], and I appreciate it. I have followed this for years. This is not the bill that the chairman wanted, but he brought this out because he had a tie-up in his committee, and he felt it proper that he should stand by the bill as it was reported out; but, remember, the greater number of Democrats on that committee are standing by the amendments that will be offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], if I am not improperly advised, and I appeal to you Democrats to stand by those amendments when they are offered.

I am sorry to see partisanship enter into this, but it has always been so ever since we have been trying to get Muscle Shoals disposed of and the Norris Dam disposed of. It was opposed by the Republican side, and I see my friend from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] sitting back there. A few days ago I came on the floor just as I heard him say that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] looked up his record in Martindale, and tried to hold him up to ridicule in this House by handing it to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN]. I do not know that it is ridicule to ask a gentleman on the floor about an advertisement that he has as a lawyer placed in Martindale, and, my dear sir, it was not done for that purpose. I did not know the gentleman's background.

I was entitled to know his background. As a good lawyer, whenever he has an adverse witness before him, always makes inquiry as to who the witness is, his mode of living, and so forth, and the gentleman's action before this House that day, when he was confronted by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DUNN], was rather embarrassing to the rest of us, because we meant no reflection then upon him. But the gentleman stated that he was a lawyer for public utilities and that is no reflection upon him as a lawyer.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I submit that the gentleman from Tennessee is not addressing himself to the question before the House, and I make the point of order.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am addressing my remarks clearly to what the gentleman said the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed in order.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I shall be just as much in order as I know how, and I believe I know how, but I want to carry that a little further. I say now that I mean no reflection and I meant no reflection then, but do you not need to know the basis of a man's thinking?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Tennessee is not addressing himself to the matter before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule is that the speaker must confine himself to the bill, and not indulge in personalities.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. The question in this House is whether or not you are for public utilities or against them. Take those who speak for public utilities. We consider the basis of their thinking.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. A few moments ago I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to intimate that the chairman of the committee [Mr. McSWAIN] is not in favor of the bill which the committee has reported.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I did not say that. I said this, and I say it frankly. If the gentleman from South Carolina had been able to bring out the bill he is in favor of, it would not have been this bill.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I might add that the bill which we have before us today was originally written by three members of the committee, all of whom are Democrats. To be sure there were some amendments——

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Oh, the gentleman must not take up my time.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. I think it would be better for all parties to let the chairman of the committee speak for himself.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am sure that is so, but I am sure that I have not misrepresented the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield the gentleman 3 minutes more.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, there is no reason for partisanship in this. I voted for dams and for canals all over the United States, and gentlemen here know it. This is a great development of the South, not only because it carries the name of the Tennessee Valley, but six States are directly interested. It is not a local project, it is national, and the men who run that Commission are not local, and the men who are employed in the offices as auditors and comptrollers come from every State practically in the Union. I happen to know the assistant comptroller comes from Washington.

This is the President's dream. It is the dream of the Southland, and I appeal to you as Members of this Congress to put these amendments that I have referred to into the bill and not hogtie us, which you will if you adopt the bill which has been brought out. I appeal to you, my friends. I appreciate, and we from the Tennessee Valley and from the Southland appreciate the situation; and I appeal to you who are interested in the development of the Nation, because you all know the development of one section with transportation and means of communication means the progress and the good of the whole Nation. I thank God that I have no sectional feeling in my heart for any part of the country. I am for my country, and I stand behind our President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, in a desire to make it what it should be. [Applause.]

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ROBSION].

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, as stated the other day, I have never in my life represented any utility company as its lawyer or agent. I have never owned any stocks and securities in any utility company.

I favor the locking and damming of the rivers of this country where feasible and necessary to provide for the Nation's defense, for flood control and the development of power, but with due regard to the necessity, feasibility, and economic value of the undertaking. I am opposed to the Federal Government's owning and operating utilities. When I entered Congress in 1919 we were urged to vote $50,000,000 to finish the great dams and power plant at Muscle Shoals. The Government had spent approximately $100,000,000 to develop the dams and power plant at Muscle Shoals. Its purpose was to make explosives and help win the World War, but the war ended without Muscle Shoals contributing any help whatever. When I came to Congress we were told that if we would appropriate $50,000,000 a great fertilizer plant would be erected and operated at Muscle Shoals, and this would provide cheap fertilizer to the farmers of the Nation. It was pointed out that the farmers were being oppressed by the great fertilizer concerns. This $50,000,000 was appropriated, Muscle Shoals completed, but up to this time it has not made and furnished a single pound of fertilizer. That additional $50,000,000 was secured because it had the backing of the various farm organizations of the country. About that time Henry Ford came along and suggested that if we would turn over to him Muscle Shoals he would pay us $5,000,000 for the investment, and if the Government would loan him the $50,000,000 necessary to complete Muscle Shoals he would pay it back in 50 or 100 years and pay interest at the rate of some 2 or 3 percent. Our friends in the South, who are now whooping it up for T. V. A., thought they had found a "mare's egg." We voted some 2 or 3 times in the House to let Henry Ford have it. He finally backed out, and the Government has had an investment of $150,000,000 in Muscle Shoals. It has produced a little power but no fertilizer. It has been the great "white elephant" of this Government.

T. V. A.

Mr. Roosevelt was elected President, and in 1933 a movement was put on foot to create the Tennessee Valley Authority—T. V. A. It was to construct some dams at Norris, Tenn., and other places, and make a hook-up with Muscle Shoals, produce fertilizer, protect soil from erosion, aid navigation and the national defense, and the T. V. A., one of these big, overgrown bureaus, set in, and they have already spent $121,000,000. I am not objecting to the building of the dams and the improvement of navigation and the aid, if any, to the national defense, but this T. V. A. is going beyond the authority granted to it; it has gone into the poultry business—paid $500 for a rooster. I do not know of any rooster anywhere that would be worth $500 unless it is the Democratic rooster. [Applause.] It paid $1,500 for a jack, and sold the jack for $500. It bought 25 head of milk cows and paid on an average of more than $350 per head. It built a park and spent about a million dollars of the taxpayers' money. It has built a lot of tourist cabins at a cost of about $5,000 apiece to rent to tourists. It has built a city costing $3,500,000. It has constructed a number of big, fine highways costing millions of dollars. When these dams are once constructed there is no need of a city of brick and stone, there is no need of this great number of highways leading to this dam. I am advised that 20 men will be able to take care of the dam, yet they built a city that will take care of several thousand people. Congress has no authority to delegate the power to anyone to engage in the poultry, the dairy, tourist camps, and other like businesses, and to be paid out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. The T. V. A. ought to be confined to its legitimate and legal purposes.

President Roosevelt favors the Senate bill. The Senate bill turns this crowd loose to squander and waste the people's money on almost any sort of whim that may enter the "brain truster's" head. The House bill before us puts some strings on T. V. A. It is said that the T. V. A. is to be a yardstick to find out what it costs to produce electricity. The House bill requires this T. V. A. to keep books subject to the Federal Accounting Office so that if we are going to try to find out what it costs we will know what it does cost the Government to produce electricity, and it forces this T. V. A. to confine its activities to building dams and not engaging in the poultry and dairy business or in the sale of electricity. Private industry can carry on the poultry, dairy, and electric power business. Fifty years of experience shows that light, heat, and power, on the average, in municipal and Government plants costs consumers 15 percent more than in private plants; and the taxes are 50 cents higher on the average in cities and towns with municipal plants than they are in towns with private plants. I have never seen any business yet owned and operated by the Government that did not cost more and was less efficient than where it is privately owned. Furthermore, you cannot keep politics out of anything that the Government owns or controls.

Some of you speak in rather a scornful manner about my distinguished colleague and friend from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. Mark my word, before 1937 there will be a lot of you Democrats in this country who will wish that the man in the White House and the Hopkinses and the Tugwells and the Wallaces had stuck to the old-time Democratic policies and had stuck to the Constitution, as has the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. [Applause.] I commend his courage and resolution. [Applause.]

What is this for? According to the information I have received, it is this T. V. A. Bureau running wild. They paid $500 for a rooster. [Laughter.] A rooster! What kind of rooster did they get?

Mr. MAY. That was not even a Democratic rooster.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. As the gentleman from Kentucky says, it was not even a Democratic rooster. This is the only rooster I know of that is worth $500. [Laughter and applause.] Fifteen hundred dollars for a jack, and then they sold it for $500. Three hundred and sixty dollars or more for milk cows! My God, where is the Democratic Party going? It is putting the Government into the poultry business and the dairy business. That is not a proper matter of Federal Government. The production and sale of light and power is not a governmental function, unless you want your rooster and jack to carry tail lights and front lights. [Laughter.]

Mr. LESINSKI. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Not now. I have only a short time?

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Morgan testified that this institution, T. V. A., was to run for a hundred years or more. One of the amendments to be offered is in the matter of finances so that books may be kept. What does the gentleman think about that?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I understand that certain administration leaders are fighting the proposition of keeping books on this concern. Their attitude cannot be defended. Furthermore, if T. V. A. is to be used as a yardstick, every item of cost should be charged.

Mr. SCHULTE. Who is going to beat Roosevelt—Hoover?

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. There will be plenty of people to beat him. He came in with a landslide and will go out with a landslide.

IT WILL GREATLY INJURE THE MINING INDUSTRY

The soft-coal industry of Alabama, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia is now and has been for a long time in a bad way. For the past year this country used over 100,000,000 tons of coal less per year than it did for a like period of time a few years ago. On April 1, 1935, there were 25,000 more unemployed miners in this country than there were on April 1, 1934. The proposed expansion of T. V. A. is a real threat to the miners and mining industry. While the T. V. A. plants are being constructed it will provide jobs for two or three thousand people. After it is completed it will provide jobs for a very small number of people, certaintly not more than 50, unless the Government is going into the power business on a large scale and runs the power plants in the cities and towns and provides power for industry and commerce. The T. V. A. will destroy scores of coal mines in southeastern Kentucky alone. It will throw out of employment many more of the coal miners in southeastern Kentucky. At the same time the Government will force the private industries to pay their taxes, and such taxes to cover the wasteful extravagances of T. V. A. It will not aid recovery but will retard recovery. It will not cut out unemployment but will add thereto. It will not reduce the burden of government to the people but will increase those burdens; therefore, why should we continue to pour untold millions into this proposition to run poultry farms, dairy farms, tourist camps, and engage in the production or sale of power in violation of the Constitution?

SURPLUS POWER

I wish to commend the very able and courageous speech made by my friend and colleague from Kentucky [Mr. MAY]. He declares that this T. V. A. crowd is following socialistic, paternalistic, and communistic policies. He states that we are violating the Constitution, the Democratic platform in 1932, and the time-honored principles of Jefferson, Jackson, and the Democratic Party. You Democrats may not heed the warning of Mr. MAY and other Democrats now, but the time will come when you will appreciate his and their warnings. Mr. MAY stated on yesterday that T. V. A. as carried on was making against business recovery, and would add to the unemployment of this country. I agree entirely with him. There might be some justification for the administration to enter into the ownership and operation of the power, heat, and light industries in the T. V. A. territory if private concerns in that section were not already equipped to produce not only all of the power that can be sold or used but produce a surplus of more than 38 percent according to report of War Department engineers.

I was opposed to the President's utility bill in which he demanded the death penalty without a trial to put out of business scores and scores of utility concerns and destroy the stocks and securities of millions of American investors. Private utility properties in the T. V. A. section are valued at $600,000,000. I might say that some of these utility plants are owned by the cities and towns. These plants have been helping to carry the burden of Government by paying taxes to the city, district, county, State and Nation. If we turn this T. V. A. into the Treasury of the United States and continue its dictatorial power, one thing and only one thing could result and that is that it will destroy municipal and private utility concerns in that section, together with the power lines passing through that country.

I am strong for the necessary and proper regulation of utilities and power concerns, but we do not have the right to destroy them. When we destroy these power plants we do not merely hit the big fellows in the utility power business but we are hitting hundreds of thousands of little fellows in that section who are the owners of stocks and bonds of these various utility concerns, and we practically destroy the municipal plants that people in various communities and towns have established and built up by their taxes. If the great mouth of this T. V. A. shall continue to swallow up the taxes contributed by private concerns and private citizens of this country, the T. V. A. and its policies will break down and destroy property values and industry. They will engender fear and break down confidence and thereby retard recovery. It will not only knock thousands of people out of employment in that section but this action will so discourage business as to add greatly to the relief rolls throughout this country. The T. V. A. is overriding county, city, and State authorities. It is a real threat to the freedom of the people and to labor and industry throughout the Nation.

I certainly oppose the unlimited authority and funds granted by the President's bill to the T. V. A. The House bill before us is much less objectionable. We have already spent approximately $275,000,000 in the Tennessee Valley, and by the time all of the obligations imposed on the Government by this T. V. A. Bureau are discharged, it will have cost the American taxpayers far above $300,000,000. If we had a lot of surplus money in the Treasury, there might be some excuse for this waste and extravagance, but we must bear in mind that this is borrowed money that we are wasting and squandering.

President Roosevelt and his administration have already created a deficit of over $9,000,000,000, and the appropriations made for this his third year, and estimating the revenues, it shows that there will be a deficit for this fiscal year of approximately $4,500,000,000. As this will not promote recovery but will retard it, as it will not provide more jobs but will add to unemployment, as it will not build up industry but destroy many industries, and as it violates both the spirit and letter of the Constitution, I shall cast my vote against giving this T. V. A. further authority and the right to issue $50,000,000 more in bonds with the pledge of this Government behind the bonds.

Muscle Shoals was spoken of as the great "white elephant." We have now two or more great white elephants in the Tennessee Valley, and I am unwilling to create another one out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country.

ROOSEVELT WILL BE DEFEATED IN 1936

I make bold to predict that Mr. Roosevelt cannot and will not be elected in 1936. He has destroyed his chances of being reelected by repudiating his platform and the promises he made to the people in 1932. He has abandoned the time-honored principles and policies of the Democratic Party and is giving his active support to the socialistic, paternalistic, and in some instances communistic policies of the Hopkinses, Tugwells, Wallaces, and so forth. When have you heard Mr. Hopkins, Mr. Tugwell, Mr. Wallace, or Mr. Ickes speak of the "Democratic Party"? To find out your political status, you are inquired of whether you are for or against the new deal.

BROKEN PLEDGES, WANTON AND RECKLESS EXTRAVAGANCE

The Democrat platform and Mr. Roosevelt declared in 1932 that we must eliminate the bureaus and commissions that had been built up in Washington. Now, let us suppose he had told the people that when elected he would create inside of 2 years more bureaus and commissions than had been created from George Washington down to Franklin D. Roosevelt; bureaus that have regimented and put into a strait-jacket agriculture, industry, and labor. The Democrat platform declared and Mr. Roosevelt promised to reduce the cost of government at least 25 percent. Now, suppose he had told the American people, "If you elect me, I pledge myself not to cut down the cost of government, but to increase it as no other President has in all the history of our country." Suppose he had said "Our country has expended in the 124 years from Washington's administration to the first year of Woodrow Wilson's, to carry on all the expenses of our Government, to carry on all of our wars, including the great Civil War, maintain our Army and Navy, and provide care and pensions for our defenders, their widows, and orphans, a little more than $24,000,000,000; but you elect me President and I will spend more than $24,000,000,000 during the first 3 years of my term of office and I will create various other Government corporations and Federal agencies and give them authority and cause them to issue many billions of dollars of bonds and put the credit of the United States Government behind them, sell the bonds and spend the money, and let the Government take care of any losses that might be sustained."

Mr. Roosevelt declared in his speech at Pittsburgh on October 19, 1932, that—

> Taxes are paid in the sweat of every man who labors, because they are a burden on production and can be paid only by production. If excessive, they are reflected in idle factories, tax-sold farms, and, hence, in hordes of the hungry tramping the streets and seeking jobs in vain. Our workers may never see a tax bill, but they pay in deductions from wages, in the cost of what they buy or (as now) in broad cessation of employment. * * * Our people and our business cannot carry its excessive burdens of taxes.

Suppose he had said, instead of that statement, "If you elect me, I am going to impose heavy taxes on all character of beer, wines, and other liquors; I will add more than $600,000,000 annually for nuisance taxes on gasoline, automobiles, and so forth; and early in the third year of my term it is my intention to soak the so-called 'thrifty' as well as the little man."

Suppose he had said, "If you elect me, I am going to place a processing tax on wheat of 30 cents per bushel, which, with other taxes, represent at least 25 cents in Government taxes on every sack of flour, and will place heavy processing taxes on meat and other food and clothing, and in that way I am going to make pork chops 40 cents or more, lamb chops 50 cents, beefsteak in proportion, flour, meal, other foods, and clothing increase in price all the way from 25 percent to 100 percent."

He stated in 1932 that our Nation must quit going in debt and quit increasing the deficit because in the end this meant bankruptcy and ruin to our country. But suppose he had told the American people, "If you elect me President, inside of 2 years and 4 months of my administration I will increase the deficit by more than $9,000,000,000 and for the third year of my term I will create an additional deficit of more than $4,500,000,000, and for my term of office of 4 years I will pile up a deficit on the backs of the American people of approximately $19,000,000,000"; and suppose he had said further, "You good Americans do not know anything about a big national debt—if you elect me President, I am going to push it up by leaps and bounds so that by the end of the first 3 years of my term I will show you a national debt of approximately $35,000,000,000. Yes; in 3 years I will increase the national debt approximately $15,000,000,000, and this will be $10,000,000,000 more than at the close of the World War. In addition to this, if you will elect me President, I will have issued some six to ten billions of dollars' worth of bonds of corporations which I intend to have formed. I intend to have these bonds sold and have the bureaus and commissions to spend and squander and waste this money, but at the same time I intend to place the credit of the Government directly behind them."

The President said in his speeches in 1932 that it was foolish to talk about cutting down production, destroying the products of the farm or factories, but suppose he had said to the American people, "If you will elect me President, I propose to burn, destroy, and kill approximately 7,000,000 pigs and hogs—1,500,000 of these still unborn—I will kill the mother sows and at the same time destroy 1,500,000 unborn pigs. I am going to run up the price of pork chops, lamb chops, and other meats. I will plow up and destroy 10,000,000 acres of cotton. I will destroy millions of acres of corn and wheat. I will tax the people and spend hundreds of millions of dollars to take 41,000,000 acres of productive land out of production and will spend other hundreds of millions of dollars for reclamation and irrigation projects to bring hundreds of millions of acres of unproductive land into production. Although we are going to have millions of people out of work, 21,000,000 Americans on relief, hungry and shivering with cold, I propose, if elected, to make food and clothing the scarcest they have been in this country for more than 40 years."

The President said in 1932 that if we expect to maintain this country free we must maintain the rights of the States, but suppose he had said, "Elect me and by reason of the depression and the distress of the people I will demand for myself autocratic and dictatorial powers. I will wipe out State lines and county lines. I will condemn the Constitution. I will look with scorn and suspicion upon the Supreme Court that protects the rights of the people of the States, the villages, towns, and cities. I will proclaim to the world that the Constitution and the Supreme Court belong to the "horse and buggy age", and I will do my best to keep them from interfering with the autocratic rules, regulations, and procedure of myself and my bureaus and commissions that I will establish."

He declared in 1932 that the Government should not enter private business in competition with its citizens and should not enter private business except for reasonable and necessary regulation. Suppose he had told the American people in 1932, "If you elect me President I will take the taxpayers' money and put the Government in direct competition with practically every business and enterprise in this country. I will do my best to force bills through Congress that will destroy many industries and destroy the stocks and securities of millions of American investors."

Mr. Roosevelt, in 1932, promised that he would bring about the recovery of business, and unemployment would become a thing of the past. Suppose he had informed the American people, "If you elect me President I will put into effect policies that will break down confidence and will destroy private enterprise, so that on April 1, 1935, at the end of 2 years of my administration, there will be 305,000 more people unemployed than there were on April 1, 1934. I will increase the relief rolls so that at the end of 2 years and 4 months of my administration there will be approximately 21,000,000 people on relief; there will be 3,000,000 more idle spindles in the textile industry on May 1, 1935, than there were on May 1, 1934; in June 1935 the loaded cars will be 55,000 less than they were in the corresponding period in 1934, and 41,000 less than they were in the corresponding period in 1933; our foreign commerce, both exports and imports, will grow less and less, so that on July 1, 1935, I will show you that with the so-called 'reciprocal trade treaties' with foreign countries there will be more goods and products brought into this country from foreign countries than we are sending out.

"In other words, our imports will exceed our exports and the balance of trade will be against the United States; and I will show you that by these reciprocal trade treaties, while we are destroying corn and paying farmers not to produce corn, wheat, and hogs in the United States, for the first time in the history of our country cargo after cargo of corn will be shipped into this country from Rumania and middle Europe, and more than 20,000,000 bushels of wheat in less than 1 year from the Argentine in South America; and butter, cheese, cement, matches, and hundreds of other products from Norway, Denmark, Sweden, and Switzerland; and textile products from Japan. Yes, I will push through Congress a measure taxing the American people to pay for the destruction of 10,000,000 acres of cotton and to pay millions of dollars for cotton farmers not to raise cotton, and I will cut down our export of cotton for 10 months in 1934 after the processing tax goes on more than 3,000,000 bales. Yes; I will cut down the export of American cotton by more than 3,000,000 bales of cotton, and by this process I can put 500,000 cotton farmers in the South on relief; and then I will get behind the so-called "Bankhead Act" to put the Government behind a billion-dollar proposition to buy farms for these 500,000 who have been put out of business by my processing tax. Yes; in May 1935 the earnings of 50 first-class railroads in the United States will show a decrease, steel output will be on the decline, coal will be on the decline, and I will give business and industry to understand that every time they stick their heads up I am going to swat it with a big stick. I will instill in this country, group and class hatred. I will swat the poor with processing taxes and the high cost of living, and in the beginning of the third year of my term I shall swat the poor and the rich with increased taxes."

Mr. Roosevelt declared in 1932 that he was going to give fair treatment to the veterans and their dependents. In my opinion, 90 percent of the veterans voted for Mr. Roosevelt. But what if he had said to the American veterans, "If you elect me I propose to crowd through Congress the obnoxious and cruel so-called 'Economy Act' and take away the pensions of hundreds of thousands of disabled veterans and the widows and orphans of veterans and force tens of thousands of disabled and needy veterans from the soldiers' and sailors' hospitals of this country. Yes; I will spend millions of dollars for hobo hotels, I will squander and waste billions on the socialistic, paternalistic plans of the Tugwells, and so forth, but I will fight to the last ditch any attempt to pay the soldiers' adjusted-service certificates, an admitted and fixed just obligation of the Government. While they rendered the service in 1917 and 1918, I will make them wait until 1945 to get this partial pay for their service to their country."

We have pointed out what Mr. Roosevelt and the Democrat platform stood for in 1932, on which he urged the American people to elect him President. These have been abandoned, and he has followed the course we have enumerated with the result as pointed out. Roosevelt could not possibly have been elected in 1932 had he given the American people the slightest intimation that he proposed to carry out the policies and do the things that he has undertaken during his term of office.

He cannot and will not be elected President in 1936. He will have to answer to the American people for these broken pledges and for embarking upon a course that has destroyed confidence, created bitterness and discord, group and class hatred; he has destroyed self-reliance, placed a premium on waste, extravagance, and indolence; unemployment has increased, our foreign commerce has been reduced, business has been paralyzed, the relief rolls have doubled, and a general feeling of unrest and uncertainty created.

Mr. Roosevelt went into office in a landslide, and he will go out in a landslide. He has not only broken his pledges to the people but he has carried on a series of policies and plans that have proven to be abortive, except to give special privileges to a few at the expense of the many.

The American people are coming to themselves. They will still look with favor upon honesty, self-reliance, industry, and good old-fashioned common sense. Following American practices and policies and under the Constitution America has piled up nearly half of the wealth of the world; we have had more food and better food, more clothing and better clothing, more homes and better homes, more bathtubs, automobiles, radios, and other comforts of life, the highest standard of living, more liberty, and more happiness than the people have enjoyed under any other constitution, either written or unwritten, of any nation since the beginning of time, and why should we turn our backs on this wonderful record and wonderful experience and take to our bosom the socialism, paternalism, and communism of the Hopkinses, the Tugwells, and the other "brain stormers" of this administration?

Mr. Roosevelt will have to pay the penalty for violated pledges, broken promises, and his abject failure. The five billion slush fund cannot save him, and it will not bring about recovery nor materially reduce unemployment. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO] 5 minutes.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. COSTELLO].

Mr. COSTELLO. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the real problem before Congress at the present time is whether Franklin Roosevelt is going to be reelected; our real problem here today is just exactly what this Congress intends to do in the future with the Tennessee Valley Authority.

The Tennessee Valley comprises an area of some 44,000 square miles, and in this area reside over 2,000,000 people. In the territory adjacent to this valley live an additional 5,000,000 people. Prior Congresses have turned over to the Tennessee Valley Authority various properties. On this project we have expended $132,792,294. Since that time $75,000,000 was allotted to the T. V. A. and the deficiency bill which passed recently carried an additional sum of $34,000,000 for the T. V. A. The question now comes up as to what our program is to be. Are we to pass no legislation at all? Many have suggested this, that we should turn this bill down and not vote any additional legislation. What would be the effect of our refusal to pass legislation on this subject at this time? The result would be simply that the Tennessee Valley, operating under the act of 1933 which gave the Authority broad, vague, indefinite powers, will not be killed but will continue to operate. The legislation passed here, therefore, will either liberalize or restrict the activities of the T. V. A. If we pass the House bill, the bill now under consideration, we will grant to the T. V. A. very definite and specific powers. It may be said that in some respects the act of 1933 was illegal because it was not specific. In that act we authorized the building of dams, transmission lines, and things of that sort but we did not say what dams and what transmission lines should be built. In the pending bill we specifically name five dams which we authorized the Tennessee Valley Authority to construct. The pending bill gives the T. V. A. authority to complete the Wilson, Norris, Wheeler, Pickwick, and Aurora Dams, to extend the flood control and power development project upon which they have embarked.

Question has been raised as to the sale of real estate. In a great many instances the T. V. A. has purchased larger tracts of land than they actually required. It is only proper that we should compel the T. V. A. in turn to sell back to the public that land which is not necessary for their control or use. The fact they have purchased lands they did not actually need is not to their credit. I think, however, it can hardly be said that we would be saving the Aluminum Trust or anyone else by requiring the T. V. A. to sell back those parcels of real estate the Authority does not require at this time and perhaps will not require.

The bill also authorizes the generation and sale of power, the fixing of resale rates in the contracts which T. V. A. may make with municipalities or other State subdivisions, or private corporations. It likewise permits the acquisition of transmission facilities for direct sale of power to rural communities or individual farmers.

Perhaps one of the most important features of the bill is the requirement that T. V. A. shall establish a uniform system of accounting. In this way the Tennessee Valley Authority will have the same type of bookkeeping, the same system of accounts authorized and employed by other industries engaged in the utility business. In this way we shall be able to check exactly what the T. V. A. is doing and compare it with other utility concerns in all sections of the country. Then indeed will the T. V. A. be an actual yardstick.

A provision of the bill that is very much objected to is the requirement that T. V. A. shall not be allowed to sell its products, be they power or fertilizer, below the cost of production after July of 1937. Personally, I think this is a good provision because it requires T. V. A. to put their operations upon a profit-making foundation. In other words, they are not to continue operations with the idea that year after year Congress will appropriate more and more money to make up their deficits, but that it will be necessary for them to put their business upon a profitable basis and to repay the moneys they have borrowed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. What will happen to private industry during the period Congress is appropriating this money and permitting T. V. A. to sell its products at less than cost of production?

Mr. COSTELLO. The amount of products which the T. V. A. will sell between now and 1937, I do not believe, will greatly interfere with any private concerns in that particular region. In other words, I do not think the T. V. A. will be on a sufficient power-producing basis to be able to sell a tremendous amount of power down there.

Mr. MICHENER. I take it, then, the gentleman does not believe the Government should go into business and compete with private industry on terms other than those with which private industry must comply?

Mr. COSTELLO. I believe that is true, and I think the provisions of the House bill tend to protect those rates.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; they may tend to, but the gentleman will not contend for a minute that the bill accomplishes that?

Mr. COSTELLO. The only program that is before us here in the House at the present time is the House bill or the amendments which will be offered in the form of the Senate amendments. I do not think we can limit this bill to any great extent beyond that.

Mr. MICHENER. I may say that I think I am the only one on this side who since the war has voted on every occasion to complete the Wilson Dam at Muscle Shoals. I did this down to the time the transmission lines were included. We are putting ourselves here just a little further in, so that it is going to be more difficult to get out.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COSTELLO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. With reference to the uniform accounting procedure to be established, will those rules and regulations provide for the recording of capital expenditures as well as operating expenses and income the same as private industry must record these matters?

Mr. COSTELLO. At the present time it is not definitely settled what system of accounting will be employed, but it will be up to the Federal Power Commission to establish a system of accounting and then require that the T. V. A. shall follow that provision. What provisions will be included I cannot say.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is it not true that unless the Authority or the board of directors or whatever the power may be that prescribes these rules and regulations with reference to accounting procedure, does design an accounting procedure which records capital expenditures as well as operating expenditures and income in line with those used in private industry, the yardstick will be a false yardstick when the final accounting conclusions are arrived at?

Mr. COSTELLO. Undoubtedly that will be done, because the system would be set up by the Federal Power Commission and would be the same system of accounting that would be required of any private concern.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If they set up a rule of that kind, how can they start correctly if they charge off a large part of the capital expenditures before they make the first capital entry on the books to serve as a basis for the accounting procedure to determine the capital cost in order to arrive at the rate to be charged?

Mr. COSTELLO. The T. V. A., I think, is justified in charging off a great deal of the original investment in these properties due to the fact that much of the money was spent for other purposes than power purposes. They should charge only that amount which was necessarily expended to produce the power which they are actually generating. In other words, the flood-control, fertilizer, or nitrate-production features are entirely apart from the power-generating feature and should not be charged to it.

Hereafter the T. V. A. shall be directly subject to the office of the Comptroller General in the handling of funds; while this restriction limits the free and undisputed control over their own funds, it works no real hardship on T. V. A.

The public funds will be properly accounted for; the accounts of T. V. A. will be regularly checked and approved, and all transactions will be handled under the warrant system as they are in other departments; contracts will be let on competitive bids.

Finally, the House bill prohibits the duplication of transmission lines and requires that competing lines be either purchased or condemned.

The T. V. A. want to have more liberal powers than provided in the House bill. They want to be free to negotiate their own contracts without the need of letting competitive bids—to be outside the supervision of the Comptroller's office; to be able to construct duplicate transmission systems at great expense and needlessly; to be free to sell or retain any and all real estate now owned or hereafter acquired by T. V. A.

If you feel that the T. V. A. should be under some restraint, should be subject to the restriction and direction of Congress, and should be placed under the financial control of the Comptroller General, then you will support the House bill and vote down these proposed liberalizing amendments.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN].

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, it was not my purpose to again impose myself upon the membership, because on two occasions I have had opportunity to express my views on the subject now before us. If it was not for the upbraiding which I just received from the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], I would not be on my feet at this time.

My political philosophy is never to indulge in personalities of any kind. I always give my fellow man credit for his convictions. [Applause.] It has been my political experience that an individual who indulges in personalities hurts himself more than he does the individual he intends to injure. Some philosopher has said:

> The throwing of mud is a dangerous pastime, because the mud sometimes misses its mark, but some of it always remains on the hands of the one who throws it.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAVERICK. Is the gentleman in order in speaking twice on the same bill?

Mr. McLEAN. I have not spoken twice on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey will proceed in order.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I have been charged in this debate with partisanship. Let me, however, direct attention to the fact that there have been times when Members of his own party were deserting the President that I was supporting his measures in the hope that it might help in bringing about recovery. An examination of my record will prove it.

As a Member of this House I have been assigned to an important committee, and as a member of that committee certain matters came to my attention which I thought ought to be rectified. I found that the manner in which the Tennessee Valley Authority was being conducted was leading to confusion and uncertainty. I found that the men who were in charge of the Authority were disregarding the law and holding the Congress of the United States in contempt. I illustrated this to you the other day when I quoted Dr. Morgan's own words.

The Tennessee Valley Act was the product of the Congress of the United States. It provided the method by which the men appointed under it should carry on their activities. It directed them to sell $50,000,000 worth of bonds, which was to be the money they were to use until Congress voted otherwise. When asked why the bonds were not issued, Dr. Morgan, a director of the Authority, said that they did not think that was the way the thing ought to be done. This in spite of the mandate of Congress. My whole effort has been devoted to impressing on this body the necessity for a well-understood program to carry this matter out in an orderly way. Today I am able to illustrate it to you by an incident that has happened in the last few weeks.

It has always been the practice of Congress to pass a general legislative enactment that would cover a proposed improvement, outline the program, and then from time to time, as the work progressed, appropriate the necessary money. So the Tennessee Valley Act provided that these men should make a report to the Congress that would enable Congress to outline a program and to guide and control the extent, sequence, and the nature of the development. I have continually stated and reiterated that sections 22 and 23 of the law have not been complied with, and not a single Member of the Congress has answered that statement.

Then there is the incident that happened just the other day. On June 20 we had before us the deficiency appropriation bill. The able Committee on Appropriations of the House had determined that this year the Chickamauga and the Guntersville dams should be constructed and an appropriation was made for that purpose and that purpose alone, and the reason for it was fully stated in the report of the Committee on Appropriations that came out with the bill. The bill was passed and went to the Senate. I have said there is no program. There are a lot of programs, but nobody knows what the program of the Tennessee Valley Authority is. Judge McREYNOLDS has a program. His program is to get the dam at Chickamauga because that is in his congressional district, and on the 20th of June, or a day or two after, there appeared in a Chattanooga newspaper an excellent picture of the judge, giving his whole speech and telling how he had brought this great improvement to his people by the logrolling he was able to do in the House of Representatives. Then something happened in the Senate. Senator McKELLAR had a different program. Senator McKELLAR wants five dams and was preparing an amendment for that purpose. Senator McKELLAR is authority for the statement that Mr. Morgan asked for an interview with him and went over there and prepared an amendment to cover five dams in the Tennessee River, and in spite of the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, add $13,500,000 to the appropriation; not in accordance with any program except this program, the program of the Tennessee Valley, a dam for every town, and a town for every dam, and everybody to get their dams as quickly as they can.

So Dr. Morgan went over to the Senate and prepared the amendments which Senator McKELLAR proposed to introduce on the appropriation bill, and everything was all right until Senator McKELLAR found that Dr. Morgan was going about among the Senators whom he had pleaded with for further appropriations and lobbying against the proposed amendment.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman cannot discuss the Senate on the floor of the House.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DRIVER). The gentleman is informed that it offends against the rule to make any reference to the action of the other body.

Mr. McLEAN. I am speaking, sir, from the public prints which set forth that Senator McKELLAR gave the interview which I read——

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, that violates the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled, and the gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. McLEAN. And it appears now that word got to Chattanooga that Dr. Morgan had written a letter setting forth that he favored the Hiawassee Dam and throwing a wet blanket on the rest of the dams proposed by the Committee on Appropriations and by the McKellar program. Consternation prevailed. Mr. Lilienthal spent hours in the office of Mr. McREYNOLDS. Telephone calls came from Chattanooga. Everybody was upset about the matter and it became necessary for Dr. Morgan to issue another statement that he did not mean what he had said and entirely reverse himself. So the expression "double crossing" has entered into the controversy and misunderstanding between gentlemen of high purpose and high intent and high character, all because men of wisdom, men of learning, capable of being presidents of universities, capable of directing the destinies of the public utilities of the State of Wisconsin, for some reason or other see fit to ignore the law and do not want to take the Congress of the United States into their confidence and outline their program.

We would not have all this controversy and difficulty if they had done as provided in the act and taken care of the Muscle Shoals development, built the Norris Dam, and then planned the future development of the valley and come to Congress with their program and let us know where they are headed and what they are doing and let us adopt a logical program in a businesslike way. Then we could proceed from time to time with the necessary appropriations and everybody would have knowledge of what is going on. As it is now there is not a man in the House of Representatives who can tell me the future of the Tennessee Valley development under the guidance of the Tennessee Valley Authority, because the Tennessee Valley Authority does not know itself. Today they cannot tell you the necessity for this or that dam. They seem to want to please their friends in Congress; they seem to want to please those who are supporting them; and, although the logrolling method of legislating has been so much condemned in the public prints in recent years, this is the greatest logrolling proposition in my memory.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLEAN. I yield for a brief question.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman recalls that the testimony shows that Dr. Morgan stated there are 149 available power sites in the Tennessee River, and yet he is unable to give us a plan for even five or six of them.

Mr. McLEAN. There is no doubt about that; and let me tell you something else that has occurred. Dr. Morgan, in the newspaper article that I read this morning, stated that this Chickamauga Dam is going to cost $25,000,000. This astonished the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS], because he says that previous estimates only call for $15,000,000.

And he was further astonished at Dr. Morgan's statement because the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, in whom every American has confidence when it comes to construction work, had stated that this dam in all its ramifications could be built for $11,000,000.

That shows to what extent these men, in whose hands we have placed this trust, have studied what they have undertaken.

Take, for further example, the town of Norris. They started out to build the town to cost $2,000,000. It cost them $3,500,000, and when asked how that came about they said it was due to the increase of labor cost and the increased cost of material, and said that the matter of allocating the cost had not been studied, but they were going to do so after a while.

It has been my effort to bring before you what I consider to be important things in the conduct of affairs of this Nation. The success or failure of the Tennessee improvement is the success or failure of the Congress of the United States. If you allow this thing to continue in this irregular, uncertain, unbusinesslike manner in which it is now being carried on, it is destined to failure, and the people to whom you have to answer will hold you responsible long after the Tennessee Valley Authority, those who are your agents, and who are creating the situation, have passed out of the picture.

My appeal to the Congress of the United States is to say to the Tennessee Valley Authority, "Stop; you have sufficient money to build what you have undertaken. Congress will meet again shortly, and when Congress meets we want before us your comprehensive program under which you are operating." When we have that comprehensive program before us we will give it the consideration it deserves and the Congress of the United States and not these agents and creatures of Congress will be the supreme legislative body of the land. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX] 10 minutes.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, in the course of this debate I think a great many of those who have discussed this legislation have to some extent overlooked the basic principles of the act which we are here seeking to amend.

The Tennessee Valley Authority was created in the first instance for the purpose of providing for the national defense, for navigation in the Tennessee River, for flood control, and soil conservation.

This is not primarily a power project. The development of power is an important, but, after all, an incidental part of the program.

At the beginning of the World War this Nation found itself without the facilities for manufacturing munitions of war. The lack of such facilities was a serious handicap, and the Democratic administration then in power began the development of Muscle Shoals for the manufacture of such munitions.

This Democratic administration, profiting by the experiences of the World War, saw to it that provision was made in peace time that in the event the Nation should again be confronted with war we at least would have the facilities for the manufacture of munitions which would be necessary for use in any such war.

For many years the Federal Government has planned the development of the Tennessee River for navigation and in more recent years plans have been worked out for the prevention of destructive floods which occur at frequent intervals in that valley.

So the Tennessee Valley project was conceived as a combination of navigation, flood control, soil conservation, and national defense. Necessarily in the construction of the dams needed for flood control, and for navigation, and the installation of power houses, for the manufacture of war munitions in case of war it was essential that machinery be installed. It would be ridiculous if that machinery and those facilities should stand idle during peace time and be permitted to deteriorate, so that in case of war, in case of necessity, the country should find itself again without the facilities for the manufacture of munitions.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. Not now. So the manufacture of power became an incidental issue in the development of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I am just as much interested as any man on the floor of the House in trying to see to it that such surplus power as is manufactured in this development shall be sold on a basis that shall establish a real and true yardstick of value. I want to see such a yardstick established.

I believe that is one of the great services that this institution can render to this country. I wrote into this bill the provision requiring that no power shall be sold after July 1, 1937, below the cost of production. The members of my committee will remember that during the committee hearings I did not devote my time and attention in the interrogation of witnesses to the vast detail of the Comptroller's report. I did not undertake to pursue the line of questioning my colleagues did, but I devoted myself very largely in the examination of witnesses to the question of whether or not the Tennessee Valley Authority is charging a rate for its power and electric current which would serve as a true yardstick in measuring the rates charged by privately owned public utilities, particularly in the Southeastern States. I am interested in that yardstick because I believe that it is only by the establishment of that fair yardstick that the people of this country may determine for themselves whether they are paying fair rates to the privately owned utilities or are being robbed, as many people believe they are. A true yardstick, by which to measure the fairness and equity of rates being charged by privately owned utilities, must be fair to all parties concerned, it must be fair to the people in the Tennessee Valley, fair to the utility companies, but above all it must be fair to the taxpayers of the Nation. It would not be fair to anyone concerned if it did not provide for the full cost of production. It would be grossly unfair to the balance of the country if the Government should subsidize this institution. So, in order that a fair yardstick may be established, I questioned the members of the Board very carefully. I went into the items that make up their rate basis, to determine whether or not they were engaging in unfair competition with private enterprise. I was interested to know whether or not this Government is subsidizing this institution for the benefit of a comparatively small percentage of the population of the country, and I found, very much to my surprise, that although this Authority has been engaged in this business for only a short period, during which time it has been harassed by litigation, during which time it has been engaged in the actual construction of its plant, nevertheless, in spite of that, it is charging a rate for the sale of its power that includes every item that every honest and legitimate private utility is authorized by law to charge its consumers under the rulings of the various utility commissions of the country.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. Not at this time. I found on interrogating these witnesses that although, as I said, they have been harassed by litigation, and their time taken up in attending various hearings in Washington, although they have not had an opportunity to put their plant into full capacity production, yet they are charging rates based on the same requirements that are authorized by public-utility commissions insofar as privately owned utilities are concerned, and that in addition to that they are setting up a depreciation reserve which at the end of 43 years will have completely liquidated the cost of that part of their plant which is devoted to the manufacture and sale of electrical current. According to the testimony of the T. V. A. directors, at the end of 43 years the United States Government will have nothing invested in that portion of this plant which is devoted to the manufacture and distribution of electric current. Mr. Chairman, in spite of the fact that they are charging all the rates that any private utility is authorized to charge, they have been able to reduce the rate in that vicinity by 50 percent, and the people of that section of the country on a fair, equitable, and honest rate base are now receiving their current at 50 percent of what they previously were charged for it. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Does any part of the T. V. A. Authority pay any State, county, or municipal taxes?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes. The law requires them to set aside 5 percent of their gross income for taxes, and they not only do what the law requires of them but they go further and they set up 7½ percent additional, so that 12½ percent of their gross revenue is set aside for taxes, and by actual comparison with privately owned utilities in the same section that is a greater percentage of gross revenue than the private utility companies in that section pay for taxes.

Mr. CRAWFORD rose.

Mr. WILCOX. I cannot yield further. I want to call attention to this fact: Under this rate which has been set up and is now being charged in the Tennessee Valley, rural consumers, farmers in that section, who average only three or four consumers to the mile, are receiving their current at a top rate of 3 cents per kilowatt-hour.

In spite of that fact, at 3 cents per kilowatt-hour as a top rate, the associations through which it is distributed make a profit of 38 cents out of every dollar of income. Thirty-eight percent of the gross income of those associations which distribute this current is profit to the association, and they are selling the current at 3 cents, top rate, to the farmers, who are located at an average only three or four to the mile. Compare that, if you will, with my city, which does not have the benefit of the competition of the T. V. A., a town of 40,000 people, with 25 or 30 consumers not to the mile but to the block, with a top rate of 7 cents per kilowatt-hour, and the company says it is going broke and unable to pay dividends.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. When they set aside a tax fund, to which the gentleman has just referred, does that enter into the calculation of the base which is to be used in arriving at the rate?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes, sir. That is all figured in the rate base. I put the figures in the RECORD yesterday. If the gentleman will turn to the proceedings of yesterday he will there see a complete set-up of this rate base and the interrogation I made of Dr. Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal. Nobody has denied that. Nobody has come forward and said they are not correct. They are not only here and available to the gentleman, but yesterday I put them in the RECORD that you may be fully advised on that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX] has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. WILCOX. Just one other matter, and I am through. A great deal of criticism has been made, particularly by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. McLEAN] in the remarks just preceding mine, on the fact that the Tennessee Valley Authority has not worked out a completed program in the 18 months or 2 years since this thing was created. I believe they have only actually been down there a little more than a year, yet a great deal of the time of the gentleman on the other side of the aisle has been devoted to a criticism of this board because it has not been able to come to Congress with a completed program of what they expect to develop in the Tennessee Valley and the adjoining valleys. At the same time those gentlemen have held up before the Congress as a shining example of great efficiency and honesty the Aluminum Co. of America, which has acquired the valley of the Little Tennessee. I want to call to your attention the fact that this great efficient corporation, the Aluminum Co. of America, according to the testimony in this case and the speeches of the gentlemen who have spoken for them here today, have been in that valley with a great corps of engineers working constantly and continuously for 25 long years, and they have not completed their program yet. Yet this board is held up to the Congress as an inefficient institution, simply because in a period of 13 or 14 months they have not been able to survey all of the sites and work out all of the plans for a completed program for the development of this great Tennessee Valley.

One other thing on the subject of the Aluminum Co. This board has been criticized because it went into the valley of the Little Tennessee and purchased a couple of pieces of property in order that they might put themselves in a good trading position, and they have been greatly criticized for it. I want to endorse everything that my colleague from Texas [Mr. THOMASON] said yesterday when he announced his doctrine on this floor, that the natural resources, particularly the streams and power sites of this country, should and of right, ought to belong to the people of this Nation and not to private interests. [Applause.] But be that as it may, the Aluminum Co. has gobbled up the Little Tennessee Valley. They have not constructed many of the dams which they ultimately plan to construct. They have not pursued the humane policy of the Tennessee Valley Authority of paying what the property is worth, which they expect to flood. They have stood by for 25 years and held over the people of that valley a sword of Damocles that sooner or later they were going to flood their properties, and thus they have sought to drive down the price that those people were asking for their lands. The Tennessee Valley Authority went in and purchased those two tracts of land not to take advantage of the Aluminum Co. of America but to insure an orderly process of development of this entire valley. In the development of this river system for navigation and flood control it is necessary that not only the Tennessee River but its tributaries as well shall be developed in an orderly fashion. It is necessary that no private concern shall be permitted to install any obstruction in any of the tributaries of this river which will impede or interfere with this great development. The T. V. A. directors are to be congratulated and not condemned for their action in protecting this project. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Florida has again expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BOLTON].

Mr. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention in the few minutes that have been allotted to me to one feature of this proposed legislation which I believe the Committee on Military Affairs, in its desire to curb certain activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority, has overlooked, and which I believe should be corrected. May I say that my remarks or suggestions are in no way meant to be partisan but rather in the spirit of helpfulness. I have reference to the subject of navigation and the activities carried on by officials of the Tennessee Valley Authority in that respect.

While it is realized that navigation is only secondary in the objects and purposes of the T. V. A., it would seem desirable that, in attempting to correct other activities of those responsible for the operations of the Tennessee Valley Authority, more consideration should be given to the navigation feature of the legislation, which, as drawn, is so contrary to the past practice of the Government.

We are all familiar with the activities of the Government in respect to navigable waters during the past many years, and are familiar with the fact that for over 100 years the improvement and maintenance of our inland waterways has been one of the responsibilities and duties of the Corps of Engineers of the War Department. The development of our great system of water communication and the maintenance of that system has been the result of the study and splendid work of the Corps of Engineers, and carried out in accordance with a definite policy and according to the practices which have grown and been perfected up to the present time.

We are familiar with the fact that the principal duties of the Corps of Engineers in peace times have to do with flood control and river and harbor work throughout the country, and we know that under that policy the practice of the Corps of Engineers has become more and more free from outside interference and has developed a thorough understanding of the water-borne commerce of the entire Nation. Consequently, a familiarity with this problem which no other Department of the Government commands has been developed by the War Department. Today there is a specific procedure with the adoption of projects requested of Congress for river and harbor or navigation work, and after authorization and appropriation by Congress for such projects as are considered desirable, work necessary for the completion and upkeep of them is carried forward by the same group which studied and recommended the improvements and are familiar with the problem in all of their details. It has been due to the untiring and splendid work of this branch of the War Department that our great inland waterway system, extending to all parts of the country, has been developed.

In the original Tennessee Valley Act this procedure and policy was ruthlessly interfered with in the development of the Tennessee River, which development had been recommended only after a very careful and exhaustive study by the Corps of Engineers but was authorized by Congress to be placed under the Tennessee Valley Authority. In that act the law gave control to the Tennessee Valley Authority of practically everything having to do with navigation in the Tennessee River from its mouth and throughout all its branches, the single exception being the lock at Wilson Dam.

Under that legislation the Authority could build whatever structure appealed to its discretion, with or without navigation facilities, could dredge and maintain channels, and do the things that would ordinarily be the responsibility and obligation of the War Department. In fact, in that act we see a distinct change in a policy which had been so successfully pursued in navigation matters, and a part of the authority and responsibility formerly under one head taken away from one department and given to another department of the Government, free from any restrictions from the War Department.

It is believed this divergence from the successful past practice of the Government was recognized by the committee in studying the present bill, H. R. 8632. In the committee report accompanying the bill, under the subject of navigation is found a statement that—

> In the bill herewith reported and recommended to Congress it is expressly provided that the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority shall so improve the navigability of the Tennessee River as to provide a 9-foot channel from its mouth to Knoxville in accordance with the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, in a previous study of the Tennessee River recommended to Congress and enacted into law during the Seventy-first Congress, under Public, No. 520.

From the above it might be inferred that the action of the directors of the T. V. A. with reference to navigation must be directed by the Chief of Engineers in order to provide a 9-foot channel as called for—but is this correct? Let us consider section 2 of the proposed bill which amends the old act.

This section, insofar as navigation is concerned, states that the Authority—

> Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries * * * as will provide a 9-foot channel in said river and maintain a water supply for the same from Knoxville to its mouth.

It is true that this section further states that the dams mentioned in the section are to be in conjunction with certain dams enumerated in the report of the Chief of Engineers as authorized under Public, No. 520, but nothing is stated as to the responsibility of the Corps of Engineers in this, or the necessity for receiving the approval of the Corps of Engineers in connection with the development of navigation and the maintenance of the waterway after it has been completed. The inference can be drawn correctly, I believe, that the Tennessee Valley Authority is to continue in its position of having full responsibility for navigation on the Tennessee River and that the intent of the section under discussion is primarily to authorize the construction of dams as will give sufficient water supply to create a 9-foot channel in the Tennessee River. It may be implied, and I think correctly, that the section specifically authorizes the construction of certain dams specifically named in the act, and further permits the construction of other dams that are enumerated in the report of the Chief of Engineers dealing with the act and approved by Congress, namely, Public, No. 520 previously referred to.

However, the fact still remains that the past practice and policy of Congress in holding the War Department, through the Corps of Engineers, responsible for navigation on our inland waterways is, in this part of our great inland waterway system, transferred to a separate organization. The Tennessee River is one of the great rivers of our country, flowing through parts of several States of the Union and having a length of over 650 miles. The Tennessee River is a navigable waterway, and its entire length has been under improvement by the Federal Government. The further improvement of the river has been studied for many years and in a very exhaustive manner by the Corps of Engineers, and the requirements for commerce on the river and navigation features of the river are well understood by the engineers. The river is a part of our great inland waterway system which is being developed in accordance with certain definite policies by the War Department. Up to the time of the creation of the Tennessee Valley Authority, the development of this river and its tributaries, together with the responsibility for maintenance of same, had been entirely the duty of the Corps of Engineers. Appropriations for both the development and the maintenance of the river have been carried in the regular appropriations of the War Department. Would it not seem more correct to permit this policy to continue, to continue to charge the Corps of Engineers with the responsibility for our entire inland waterway system, not only in its development but in its maintenance, and where the creation of dams for power purposes is essential, to have such construction authorized only after study and approval of those responsible for navigation? Is it logical to require the Corps of Engineers to maintain a development in the construction of which they had no responsibility?

By a break-down of the policies heretofore followed it is easy to foresee what might result if this action is allowed to become a precedent in the development and maintenance of our waterway system. If the Tennessee River and its tributaries are permitted to be handled by an independent subdivision of the Government, is there any reason for not believing that such action might follow in connection with the other great rivers of our country? Is it not possible to visualize an authority handling the navigation features of the Mississippi River, another the Missouri River, and even one entirely responsible for the improvement and maintenance of our Great Lakes waterway system? The result of such a policy is only too apparent. It is only through a singleness of purpose and policy of uniform practice and procedure that has brought our inland waterway system to the position which it now holds. It is greatly to be regretted that the benefits and experience in the past years from such a unity of action for the benefit of the country as a whole, and not of one particular region, should be questioned, and it is very easy to forecast the results which may follow. Certainly there seems to be no just reason nor cause for such change in our past practices, and the fairest view we can take of the situation is that the operations of the past and the benefits derived from a uniform policy have not been fully realized.

The Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House has been for years charged with the responsibility of all legislation dealing with the improvement of rivers and harbors. The committee has reported on public works for the benefit of navigation, on the use of water power, on improving streams, and on other activities having to do with improvements for the benefit of water-borne commerce. Action such as proposed very definitely takes away this duty from the Rivers and Harbors Committee, so far as the Tennessee River is concerned, and in this respect is contrary to the past practice and the rules of the House in that this legislation has not been considered by the committee referred to. It is not only to be regretted that such an oversight sanctioned in the bill has been made by the Military Affairs Committee but it is believed essential that section II of the bill under discussion should be so amended that the construction of the dams referred to should in all cases be subject to the approval of the Corps of Engineers, in order to make certain these improvements primarily for the purpose of the development of power would not be in conflict with the navigation activities on the rivers, and that matters of navigation on the Tennessee River and its tributaries should be the responsibility of the Corps of Engineers of the War Department, both in their development as well as their maintenance. Such a change in the section would only confirm the past practice of our Government in dealing with navigation matters, but remove a state of indefiniteness which now prevails relative not only as to what branch of the Government is directly responsible for the improvement of the river but what branch is charged with the maintenance of such improvements that have been completed.

I urge the Committee to give very careful consideration to this feature of the bill which, as I have attempted to point out, as recommended is so definitely at variance with a policy of long standing that has been successfully pursued by Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH].

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to speak on the merits or the demerits of the legislation. They have been thoroughly discussed by both sides. I propose to discuss in the limited time assigned to me the question of the propaganda back of this bill.

We on this side thought a few years ago that Herbert Hoover was a pretty good progagandist, but he was merely a piker compared to this new-deal administration. We are living in the midst of a government of propaganda and ballyhoo emanating from hundreds of publicity agents paid out of the Treasury to uphold the new-deal policies over the radio and in the press. We have heard all kinds of charges, that Members have had their telephone wires tapped and that the agents of the wicked public utilities are running around buttonholing the Members of Congress. I have not yet been approached, and I doubt if other Members of the House have. I do not own any public-utility stock. I assume, therefore, I have the right to discuss this question of propaganda without fear or favor.

I would like to know just who wrote this T. V. A. bill that the new-deal administration is back of. It seems under the new deal that the Congress is required to take bills written by members of the "brain trust" and pass them without alteration, modification, or amendment.

Can it be that the Committee on Military Affairs, a great committee of this House, under a distinguished and able chairman, has double crossed the "brain trust" and actually considered and voted upon legislation in an orderly fashion and reported out a new or amended T. V. A. bill by a majority vote to be considered by the House? This is a most unusual procedure from the practice of the past 2 years, and instead of accepting the recommendations made by these propagandists and agents of the White House, the Committee on Military Affairs have dared to alter and amend the pending legislation. Talk about propaganda; it is propaganda run wild, the acme of propaganda. The "new dealers" are intoxicated by their own propaganda and publicity when they expect young radicals, often not Democrats and not elected by the people, to present legislation to this body and demand that it be adopted by the committee and by the House without amendment. This is the worst form of propaganda. This is invisible government with a vengeance.

The time has come for the House of Representatives to follow the able leadership of the Committee on Military Affairs, restore representative government, and let the House work its will upon the legislation untrammeled by the Chief Executive or his agents.

This is just a typical example of what is happening: The White House cries out "Propaganda" when the public write letters petitioning their Members to amend or oppose legislation, when, as a matter of fact, this House has been overwhelmed by propaganda from the President through his official agents—the Hurjas, the Lilienthals, the Farleys, the Corcorans, and the Cohens. If the President of the United States wants to do a service for the Government and to the American people, let him recall all these visible and invisible agents, such as the Corcorans and the Cohens, and let the House of Representatives legislate in accordance with article I, section 1 to the Constitution, that—

> All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

The Congress should be let alone and be permitted to work its own free will upon all these measures that are thrust upon it and then let it adjourn and go home without further delay. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I understand the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania has no more requests for time.

Mr. Chairman, it is not my desire to detain the Committee in its consideration of this matter, except I believe it necessary to say a few words in brief exposition of my personal attitude in regard to this matter. I thought I made it plain on yesterday that I am just this sort of Democrat: I do not think that I possess all wisdom, or that I have the right to have my way about everything; and I try to be a good soldier and take orders as long as I can under my oath and under my conscience. Consequently, I introduced the legislation that was prepared by the representatives of the Tennessee Valley Authority. I also introduced a bill that was recommended by a conference of my Democratic colleagues. Subsequently, that bill having been amended in the full committee, I introduced it as amended so that a clean bill would come before the House; and I repeat that whatever the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union may do, I will vote for the bill in the House when the vote comes, because I believe as did Solomon of old when he said that "in a multitude of counsel there is wisdom." I do say, however, with all deference and I trust with becoming modesty, that I ought to have some little right to say what I think is proper and best to carry out the national policy set forth in the act of May 18, 1933, known as "the Tennessee Valley Act of 1933." Why do I say this? I say this because ever since 1923, as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, I fought what in popular parlance are called two trusts, the Fertilizer Trust and the Power Trust. The Fertilizer Trust did not want the Government to use this plant for the manufacture of fertilizers for the farmers of the whole country. Do not think that the only eroded lands in the South are in the Tennessee Valley, for we farmers on the other side of the Blue Ridge Mountains are also faced with the problem of erosion. We had hoped we would get some direct benefit in the form of fertilizer. We have now only one trust to fight, the Power Trust. Somehow or other the Fertilizer Trust had been chloroformed.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I hope the gentleman will permit me to complete my statement before he asks me to yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I wish to ask a question on fertilizer.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I prefer to complete my statement without interruption.

Mr. MICHENER. But you are not making that fertilizer down there.

Mr. McSWAIN. I am going to do the talking now, if the gentleman please.

Mr. Chairman, when this committee brought that bill into the House 2 years ago it provided that fertilizer must be manufactured. Fertilizer, in my judgment, is a vital and essential factor touching the constitutionality of this whole program, to wit, fertilizer is essential for national defense. Why? What connection is there between fertilizers and national defense?

The more nitrogen you can fix and the more phosphorus you can extract, the better you will be prepared with munitions in time of war. Not only that, but we intended that this program should be a yardstick, not merely for fertilizer, but it was thought and believed that the cost of munitions in time of war might be greatly reduced, and that it might be a yardstick to ascertain whether or not those who manufacture munitions have been exploiting the Government. It was reported in 1926 by a commission appointed by the President of the United States, of which Hon. John C. McKenzie, formerly Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, was the chairman, that by the proper use of modern and scientific methods the cost of fertilizer could be cut to 42 percent of the price now prevailing.

In section 5, subsection (j) of that act, it was provided to this effect:

> That the Authority should upon the request of the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy manufacture and sell at cost to the United States explosives of nitrogenous contents.

No one ever thought that the fertilizers would be given away in quantity to the farmers here and there, or that power would be given away indiscriminately to anybody in the Tennessee Valley or anywhere else. Why do I make that statement? When this committee brought in the bill with reference to power 2 years ago it provided what? On page 9 of the House bill:

> That the Authority shall not proceed to construct any other dam herein authorized where power alone will be generated or where power will be generated in connection with navigation, unless there is a reasonable demand for so much of the power as will yield a return on the part of the investment representing the cost of power production.

That is what our committee said 2 years ago. I reported that bill and I believe in that proposition. But in the law which was enacted, though that part of the bill was stricken out in conference, it was provided in section 9, subsection (a), that the Board should file with the President an annual report and among other things there was provided:

> This report shall include an itemized statement of the cost of power at each power station.

That is what we enacted 2 years ago. It is not unnatural that I should feel somewhat hurt that some of the enthusiastic propagandists, to wit, some of the directors, think that I am derelict in my loyalty to this proposition because I have not seen fit upon due consideration to go to the full length that they propose. [Applause.] I submit that time will show that by my doing what I have been doing, and I am doing today, that is, proposing that we be careful not to trespass upon constitutional limitations, I am being the best friend that the T. V. A. could ever have. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I am not going to trifle with my constitutional oath. I believe in public ownership of utilities. You cannot preach that to me. But it is primarily a State function. The State owns the rivers and the State owns the very land on which the navigable rivers roll. The State of Alabama a few years ago sent up a commission headed by the Governor claiming the Wilson Dam. You gentlemen who have come here since did not know that. They claimed the title to the Wilson Dam because it was placed upon land to which the State had title.

When the committee brought in this bill a few years ago authorizing construction of the Cove Creek Dam to control flood waters, every Democratic Member from the State of Tennessee voted against it except the distinguished gentleman, Mr. McREYNOLDS. Why? Because they thought it was an infringement of State rights to flood three or four counties. Though this House passed the measure, it was fought bitterly in the Senate. Mr. Chairman, there is some history back of this thing. I have tried to be consistent all through the years.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I said every Democratic Member. I did not include my good friend.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. I voted for the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; but the gentleman is not going to claim to be a Democrat.

Mr. Chairman, I believe in public ownership of public utilities as is going on in South Carolina. The State of South Carolina is proposing to harness the river that has the largest volume of water on the eastern coast, the Santee River, but it is the State that is going to harness the river. The county of Greenwood is proposing to harness the power on the Saluda River and to flood much of the very land on which I played, hunted, and fished as a boy, but it is the agency of the State which is doing it.

Now, read my report that I made 2 years ago and read the one which I made on this bill. I believe that the waters belong to the people. I am willing to go just as far as the Constitution of the United States will permit the Congress to go in the use of their power, but I am not willing to go one step further than I think the Constitution permits us to go. Why? Some of us have been practicing law a little while. You need not deceive yourselves that this is not going to get to the Supreme Court of the United States. The courts are open to everybody. Every liberty-loving citizen of the United States thanks God that the courts are open to them. You cannot blame anyone for going to the courts in order to try to protect his rights, and whatever the abstract right or wrong of this question may be, it will go to the Supreme Court of the United States. When this matter does get there I do not want it to be said that I advocated legislation that would violate the Constitution, and have the Supreme Court give me a nice little kick in the pants for not respecting my oath. It is the business of the Members of Congress to respect their oaths.

More than that, and in reference to the matter of cost, the act passed in 1933 declared this policy, showing it was in the mind of the Congress that the proposition should be self-sustaining and self-liquidating, page 8, section 11:

> This policy is further declared to be that the projects herein provided for shall be considered primarily for the benefit of the people of the section as a whole and particularly the domestic and rural consumers to whom power can be made available, and, accordingly, the sale to, and use by, industry shall be a secondary purpose to be utilized principally to secure a sufficiently high load factor and revenue returns which will permit of domestic and rural use at the lowest possible rates and in such manner as to encourage increased domestic and rural use of electricity.

In other words, what did that say? We want the primary use to go to the farmers and the small villages, and we are going to sell to industry in wholesale quantities in order to get a sufficient load factor to pull down the cost of the entire aggregate so that the cost to all customers concerned will be at least equal to the cost to the Government. This was the policy declared.

So in three places we declared that it was the policy of this Government, solemnly declared in 1933, that this proposition should ultimately be self-sustaining.

Now, I admit that a new concern just starting out cannot be expected to conform to this policy. Therefore, I think a reasonable time should be given in order that the concern may be put upon a fair and reasonable basis, and, while I have not had an opportunity to analyze the amendment proposed by my distinguished colleague from Alabama [Mr. HILL], it seems to me, at first blush, ultimately that may accomplish the result we had in mind in 1933.

However, I must say that on the matter of the General Accounting Office and its control and jurisdiction over the disbursements of this corporation, I would not have brought it back into this matter voluntarily, but I told my friends, some of them on the committee, and the directors, that if somebody else brought it in, and if it was forced upon me, I would be obliged to support it. It was brought in, and the record will show how it was brought in, and I had to support it, and I am not going to backtrack on that now, and I will tell you why. Among other things, when I first came to this Congress in 1921, one of the first pieces of legislation we enacted was what is known as the "Budget law" to put all Government disbursements under the General Accounting Office, and one of the strongest advocates of that law was then the ranking Democrat on the Committee on Appropriations, and he is now the Speaker of the House. [Applause.] Ever since then, even during the years when he continued to be the ranking member and finally became the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, there has been no stronger defender of the proposition and principle that all Government money should be disbursed through the General Accounting Office.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McSWAIN. If it is for information, I will yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. If the gentleman now is so strong for the program of putting this under the General Accounting Office, why was it that the gentleman brought in a bill that took the Army and Navy Procurement Division out from under McCarl and brought about the system of noncompetitive procurement of aircraft that exists in these departments today?

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman did not do it.

Mr. McSWAIN. I will tell the gentleman why. That bill was like a lot of other bills, a compromise.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; I do not yield further now. Let me answer your question, if you please.

The Morrow board had brought in a report that it was thought by the aircraft manufacturers would give them an open sesame to the Treasury of the United States so that the officers of the Army and the Navy could buy aircraft just like you would buy a pair of shoes. I fought this, and although we Democrats were in the minority I won over enough Republicans on that committee to bring the vote down to 11 to 10. Being about equally divided, the chairman of the committee saw he could not put the Morrow Board plan through this House and a subcommittee was appointed. I was appointed on the subcommittee, and I won there what is known as "the principle of competitive designs." I won everything I could; and, finally, I had to yield on one point; but to show that the Speaker never yielded, JOE BYRNS asked me right back there by that railing one day if I thought I could defend it; and he stated, "I do not like that provision. I do not like this idea of going around the General Accounting Office." All those provisions were inserted in the bill in conference.

That is why; and I am getting hardly anything I want in this bill I would like to have; and if the gentleman can put in any amendments I am still going to vote for the bill; and I hope the gentleman will vote for the bill, whatever the circumstances may be.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; I am very sorry.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield for just one question?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield for one question.

Mr. RICH. Is there any reason why the Government should not want to have its accounts audited the same as the accounts of individuals or of private enterprises? Is there any reason why the Government should be afraid or should not permit this audit?

Mr. McSWAIN. The Government is not afraid.

Mr. RICH. Then why did we not keep that provision in the bill?

Mr. McSWAIN. The Government is not afraid. In every department of this Government the contracting office does not settle the accounts. The Department, like the War Department or the Navy Department, makes the contract and the settlement is made by the General Accounting Office. This is the case everywhere and is what I think ought to prevail here.

Now, I am willing to concede up to a certain point on that. They say they have already started these dams under another system and it is stated that 2 or 3 years will be necessary to finish them. I say, "All right, give them 3 years more." I was in favor of 3 years, but the committee cut us down to 1 year, or until 1936. However, I am in favor of any policy that will ultimately bring them under the control of the General Accounting Office. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision (i) of section 4 of the act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso: "Provided, That nothing contained herein or elsewhere in this act shall be construed to deprive the Corporation of the rights conferred by the act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1422, ch. 307, secs. 1 to 5, inclusive), as now compiled in sections 258a to 258e, inclusive, of title 40 of the United States Code."

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I took no time under general debate, but do desire now, at the opening of the reading and the amendatory stage of the measure, to reiterate some of the things that have been stated in general debate.

First among them, Mr. Chairman, is the hope that the membership of this House will seriously consider and rightfully support all of the amendments that will be offered to this bill, constructively, by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. Whenever Mr. HILL of Alabama offers an amendment you may depend upon it that that amendment—and this is for your information—embodies the desires of the President of the United States and of those who are heart and soul in accord with the fundamental principles of the T. V. A., and of those who are interested in seeing a genuine bill enacted here at this session, instead of the emasculated measure which is before us.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. And may I say in that connection that by voting against the amendments offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] the Members will vote for the bill which represents the majority opinion of the Committee on Military Affairs, acting after long and conclusive hearings in their own right.

Mr. KVALE. I shall have to concede that, sorrowfully.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I do not think the gentleman should concede that, for this reason: The gentleman knows that this bill was reported out fundamentally simply that this House, this Committee of the Whole, might have the opportunity of acting on this proposition.

Mr. KVALE. And I think this should be stated in addition, and I now, for one, want publicly to express my thanks to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SCHAEFER], who by yielding to the urgent desires of the President and the administration, and after having succeeded in offering an amendment which, when adopted, removed his essential objections to the bill, was able to vote to report the bill so that we can now consider it.

Otherwise, this House would have been denied the privilege of voting on this measure in any shape.

Mr. SHORT. But the gentleman will admit that the bill was tabled by a vote of 13 to 12, and that it was voted out by a vote of 13 to 12 after we had adopted the House amendments?

Mr. KVALE. That is true, and we are trying to correct some of those damaging amendments through the proposed Hill amendments. The gentleman does not agree with me, but I will say that he is sincere in his position, just as I know that he will admit that I am in mine.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. If the amendments of the gentleman from Alabama are adopted, will the bill then be similar to the bill passed by the Senate?

Mr. KVALE. In major respects. It will salvage many of the things that had to be thrown overboard in order to capitulate to the Power Trust, the Aluminum Trust, the Coal Trust, and some of the other powerful agencies which emasculated this measure before it came to the Chamber.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I want to say that I am in favor of the Senate bill.

Mr. KVALE. I thank my friend; I agree.

Mr. Chairman, I think a word should be said for the chairman of this committee [Mr. McSWAIN]. Naturally actuated by a sense of loyalty to his full committee, he stands square in his usual, sincere style, and proceeds to wage his fight to protect the bill as a majority of his committee reported it as he sees it according to his duty. But I do not think we are going to offend that genial and gracious and kindly chairman of the committee if we adopt these amendments sponsored by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. I know his personal convictions, and the history of this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, my point is this: These amendments seek to embody in the measure some of the provisions considered vital in the Senate bill, which have been discussed at length in general debate, which appear in the RECORD this morning, and which are further verified and explained in the supplemental report which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] and myself carefully prepared, and which are embodied in the report which accompanies the bill. I hope every Member of the House will do us the courtesy of reading that supplementary report.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman refers to a Coal Trust in opposition to these so-called "amendments." I should like to have the gentleman identify the Coal Trust for the House.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman imposes upon me a task which would take a great deal more than 5 minutes, and I must ask to be permitted to continue my line of argument and take that up perhaps at some later time.

Mr. Chairman, the issue is clear. There should not be anything to confuse this House. The T. V. A. has built up a distinguished record. If the Members of this body will do Mr. MAVERICK and myself the courtesy of reading that supplementary report, and verify its statement by quotations from the transcript of the hearings, they will find out that many of these unjustifiable statements about the disdainful attitude on the part of the directors of the T. V. A. and similar allegations are wholly unjustified, and they will learn to their own complete satisfaction that this corporation, operated in the public interest, is facing squarely the issue of serving the public not only in that area but of the entire United States.

It has taken on a Gargantuan task and has performed it with surprising ability, and the members, from Mr. Morgan and Lilienthal on down through the subordinate executives, have a record which their successors and their associates and companions can point to with full pride.

I am proud of Dr. Morgan; I am proud of Mr. Lilienthal; I am proud of what they have done. I grant, in the same breath, they have been guilty of certain minor infractions; but if you will do Dr. Morgan the simple courtesy—yes, the duty—of reading his testimony in the opening pages of volume 2 of the hearing, you will discover for yourselves that 97 percent of all purchases have been made in accordance with law, and that the so-called "irregularities", the so-called "injustices", the so-called "imperfections", the so-called "peculations", have been justifiable, each individually for itself. There has been a defense established for each of them. They have been in the interest of the public.

This organization, bear in mind, is fighting the most powerful and most well-organized forces that are in existence today in America, from an economic and industrial standpoint. There are too many petty things thrown into this debate. We should consider the larger aspects. Think of this great area being rehabilitated. Think of the yardstick that it is attempted to set up to break the hold of one of the most powerful industrial groups in the United States. Think of the dream of a Chief Executive of the United States which seeks to restore whole areas and which seeks to hold out contentment, security, peace, comfort, and convenience to the overworked housewives of an impoverished area, and ultimately, by example, to an entire Nation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I regret very much that in the debate yesterday I must have been misunderstood by some of my committee colleagues. I regret very much more the fact that some of my very genial, friendly, high-class colleagues in the committee chose to make me personally the issue in this discussion, rather than the controversial features of this bill. I am attacked because I have opposed the activities of the T. V. A. because of its disastrous effects on the coal industry. It is called a "trust", and today it lies prostrate. Thirty thousand men in my district toil in the coal mines for a living, and every time legislation is offered that adversely affects their rights to make a living, their opportunity for earning a livelihood is lessened.

You were told yesterday that I voted for the original act under which we are now operating when it was first passed in this House. That, to the gentleman who made the statement, is undoubtedly believed to be a correct statement, but it is nevertheless a misstatement. What I voted for on the first vote in this House was a bill that the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives brought out of that committee, that had no relation to or any resemblance of the Senate bill which was finally adopted, and what I voted for on the conference report later was this entirely different bill. The House Military Affairs Committee passed a bill which provided that the Government of the United States should develop the Tennessee River strictly along the lines of the Federal functions of national defense, flood control, and navigation on the Tennessee River for the purposes of interstate commerce. I voted then, as I have tried to vote since, with the administration; and to show now that this committee has been exceedingly fair to the Tennessee Valley Authority, I am standing with the chairman of my committee for this bill, because I believe this bill is a remedy for the defects that were in the bill that was passed and under which the Tennessee Valley Authority is now operating. To show that we tried to be fair we brought the bill out to the House when we had the power to keep it in the committee if we had desired to do so.

The first amendment that will be offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] will be an amendment to provide that the Tennessee Valley Authority shall have an indefinite time in which to make certain investigations and recommendations to the Congress, with regard to the cost of production of electricity.

The bill says that after July 1, 1937, the Authority shall not sell surplus power or chemicals produced by it below the cost of aggregate production for each year. The first amendment will be to strike out that provision. The testimony before our committee shows that the Muscle Shoals Dam, with 240,000 kilowatt capacity, is now in existence and has been for years; that it is available for production, and that the Norris Dam will be completed before the first of next year, yet we are giving them until July 1, 1937, 2 years from the 1st day of this month, in which to be able to sell electricity at a profit. In that time they will have completed the transmission line from the Norris Dam to the Muscle Shoals Dam. They will have available then enough power to furnish the entire Tennessee Valley if they could get to it. I assume that this committee wants to hold them to the provisions of the original act, which provided that they should ultimately sell power at a profit, if they did sell it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. The next amendment that will be offered to the bill will be to strike out all of the bill on page 12, beginning with line 3 and ending with the word " disapproval " on page 13. That is the provision which requires that all moneys appropriated by the Committee on Appropriations of this House and that all moneys allocated from any other source to the Tennessee Valley Authority shall be covered into the United States Treasury and go through the General Accounting Office and be accounted for just like any other bureau of the Government. We felt that that was important for this reason: The Tennessee Valley Authority, in less than 1 year after it was first organized, had set up a bureau in Knoxville, Tenn., that occupies five great buildings. They have 3,000 officers and employees in those buildings, in addition to 13,000 men on the pay roll on the outside. We felt that a bureau that could expand like that, a bureau that could expend a million and a half dollars every 30 days, ought to be required to account for the taxpayers' money through the same methods and channels that is required of other departments of the Government. [Applause.]

That is the reason that provision was inserted in the bill. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] will propose to strike that out. If they propose to be economical in the expenditure of their funds, what objection can they have to it?

Mention has been made about the position of Comptroller General McCarl in the matter. Let me call attention to this statement of his in the hearings; it is not lengthy, only about 10 lines. This is his testimony. Let me say further, before reading the quotation, that this section invokes the aid of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that in the letting of contracts for materials they shall all be let after advertisement and public bidding to the lowest and best bidder. They do not even want to comply with this requirement. Comptroller General McCarl made this statement:

> Let us take section 3709 of the Revised Statutes. The purpose of the statute was to secure to the Government the benefit of open competition in connection with purchases to meet the actual needs of the Government. It is to permit all citizens who want to do so to bid, and it requires acceptance of the low bid meeting the specifications bid upon. It was to insure getting the most for the Government's money, to be fair with all citizens bidding, and to require conduct of the public business in making purchases on a competitive and fair basis as those who enacted the law believed it should be conducted.

What is wrong about requiring this wild, extravagant, money-spending, riotous-living bureau that is buying airplanes to fly from one office to another when they could just as well take a train or drive an automobile—what is wrong about the action of the Congress of the United States in requiring them to live up to the same regulations that other governmental agencies must meet? There is not a thing in the world wrong about it, not a thing. [Applause.] When the Congress of the United States puts itself in the attitude of not making this extravagant monster conform to practices required of all other bureaus and Government agencies, it puts itself in a position to be criticized, and justly criticized, by the country. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KELLER. Do I understand it to be the rule of the House that when a committee has controlled the entire time for general debate that members of the committee may also control all time under the 5-minute rule?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman correctly understands the rule insofar as preference in recognition is always accorded to members of the committee reporting the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rule, when an amendment is offered there is debate for and against the amendment and a member of the committee is entitled to recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. But I do not understand that members of the committee are entitled to preference over other Members of the House when it comes to pro forma amendments such as motions to strike out the last word.

Mr. EDMISTON rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Mississippi that under the rules the preference in recognition extends all the way through to members of the committee, and the Chair so rules.

The gentleman from West Virginia is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Chairman, I want particularly to call the pending bill to the attention of those Members of the House who like myself represent coal-mining districts. In the first place, very eminent engineers disagree on the question of whether electrical energy can be manufactured cheaper by coal or water power. After listening to the testimony of the Doctors Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal before the Committee on Military Affairs, it is my personal belief that if in the cost of the power developed by the Tennessee Valley Authority there was reflected a proportionate share of the fair cost of the dams and a fair rate of interest on that money, we could manufacture electrical energy in West Virginia where we dump coal off the tipple into the power plant cheaper than they are manufacturing it in the Tennessee Valley. [Applause.]

Do you Members representing coal-producing districts realize that the only market you have in this country for slack coal is the steam-operated electric plants? If you continue the operation of this Tennessee Valley project to the extent Dr. Morgan on the witness stand advocated—that there is to be no stop to it—you will eliminate your only market for slack coal; and the price of lump coal is bound to advance because the coal mines will have to dump the slack coal over the side of the hill for lack of a place to sell it.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. EDMISTON. Yes; I yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman, of course, realizes that he must combine the problem of distribution with the problem of production of power.

Mr. EDMISTON. The problem of distribution is the same regardless of how the power is generated. [Applause.]

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield.

Mr. FORD of California. What connection is there between the production of power by coal and the production of power by water down in the Tennessee Valley and coal mines in the gentleman's district?

Mr. EDMISTON. The connection comes about by reason of the fact that the Government with its unlimited funds can build 15 dams, if necessary, to insure sufficient water in a dry year to maintain the flow necessary to generate power, but a private company, not having inexhaustible funds, not having the United States Treasury behind it, must augment its water-power plant with a steam plant.

Mr. FORD of California. That is true, but that has nothing to do with T. V. A.

Mr. EDMISTON. It certainly had something to do with the coal markets, for it will destroy them.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMISTON. I yield.

Mr. RICH. I should like to say to my colleague from West Virginia that the Government does not have an unlimited supply of funds. Soon they will be all gone, and we shall wreck this country if we do not stop this ruthless expenditure of funds.

Mr. EDMISTON. Another fact I wish to call to the attention of the Committee in my limited time is that if this bill stayed tabled in the Committee on Military Affairs it would not stop the activities of the Tennessee Valley Authority; they would carry right on, for they still have plenty of money. They do not need any more money now, so this legislation is not necessary to enable them to continue.

I should also like to call to the attention of the Committee a statement made by the late Thomas A. Edison:

> We shall steadily require more power, but a great deal more fuss is being made over hydroelectric power than its intrinsic value warrants. Water power is a political issue, not a business one.

I quote this eminent authority to show that this issue is political, and there has been no business ability demonstrated in its management since its inception.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, one of the things which is worrying a great many Members of the House in reference to this T. V. A. matter is that it is a step toward national public ownership of electric utilities. This is a grave mistake. The T. V. A. does not mean toward national ownership; it means the creation in the Tennessee Valley of a yardstick by which the cost of production, distribution, and final consumption of electric power may be reasonably measured for the benefit of the people of that great district as well as other parts of this Republic.

I happen to represent Los Angeles, Calif., which has the most successful publicly owned power plant in the United States. Permit me to tell you why I am in favor of the Hill amendments, particularly the one which permits the T. V. A. to buy these competing lines without going into court. The city of Los Angeles went 250 miles up into the Owens Valley to get its water. In bringing this water down to the city of Los Angeles we had a 3,500-foot drop. We built power plants through which this water would run to supply the city. The power companies allowed us to build our plants, ready for production, and then took us to court and kept us there for 5 years, which cost the city $5,000,000 before it could turn a wheel in the plants which it had completed. The city finally bought the distributing plant of the private company and paid them about twice what it was worth, but that was O. K. Then we started distribution. We own two-thirds of the distributing system in the city. The citizens of Los Angeles were paying 11 cents per kilowatt-hour when we started. Now they pay 4.8 cents per kilowatt-hour, and it drops 1 cent very quickly after a few kilowatt-hours are used. We have been the yardstick for the whole of the Southwest, and have saved the people of the Southwest and the people of the State of California about $500,000,000 in power rates, because the power companies did not have the guts to charge 11 cents when we could produce and distribute electric power for 4.8 cents. That is the situation; and yet some Members here are trying to camouflage this matter by talking about details.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The power companies charge more than twice as much in West Virginia as they charge in the District of Columbia, and yet in West Virginia they make the power with West Virginia coal.

Mr. FORD of California. The gentleman from West Virginia who preceded me is worried about the coal situation. There are situations under which you can produce electric energy cheaper by coal than by water. That is an engineering fact that we all know about. But there are also situations whereby you can produce electrical energy cheaper by water than by coal. I submit it is fair that districts which have great natural water resources should be permitted to produce energy by water wherever they can do it cheaper than by coal. That is what we are trying to do in the T. V. A. This is a great question that the American people are going to be called upon to decide in the next election. The question is whether or not this holding-company gang, who are just as interested in the defeat of the amendments to the T. V. A. as they are in the defeat of the holding-company bill, are going to keep us from producing and distributing electric energy at a price that the people can afford to pay.

I have, my friends, adverted to the lowering of rates due to municipal ownership. Let me point out what that has meant in dollars and cents to the ratepayers, who are, in 90 percent of the cases, also taxpayers.

In the 20 years of operation of the Bureau of Power and Light of Los Angeles the ratepayers and taxpayers have been saved in excess of $100,000,000 on water and power, as compared with the rates they would have paid under private ownership.

In addition to this saving, the bureau has returned to the city treasury some four or five millions of dollars to help out in the critical period through which the city was passing from 1932 to 1935.

The city's power and water plant is worth in excess of $250,000,000. Its indebtedness is less than $100,000,000 at this time, the interest and amortization on which is promptly met each year, in addition to a handsome surplus. Part of this surplus goes to the city treasury in lieu of taxes which would be paid by a private company, which would charge twice the rates now collected by the city.

As a matter of fact, my friends, the T. V. A. fight is merely the broadening of the battle front. Our battle, and the battle of hundreds of other communities, was heretofore a local battle. The T. V. A. makes this a national battle.

There is no question of socialism, sovietism, communism, or any other un-Americanism involved.

It is merely a question whether the American people decide to exercise their God-given right to utilize the national natural resources for the benefit of all, as opposed to permitting a few rich, powerful, unscrupulous exploiters to supply them with light and power at rates that enable the exploiters to wax rich at the expense of the people themselves.

As for me, knowing from years of experience with the exploiters, knowing the methods they employ to achieve their ends, I am going to vote for the Hill amendments to this bill. My reasons are simple. I want a yardstick established. If the House bill as at present written prevails, that will be impossible.

Let us be frank, my friends. Do you trust President Roosevelt or do you trust the exploiters? It is your President and my President against the most daring, the most unscrupulous gang of financial exploiters that ever existed.

For me, I am for the President. The Hill amendments represent his views. The choice is yours. I have no fear as to the results.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs worked long and faithfully upon this piece of legislation. I do not think there is a member of that committee on the Democratic side who 2 years ago was not heartily in favor of the original act as passed by the House. But we have come to realize that, after passing the House bill, we had the Senate bill rammed down our throats in conference. We have come to realize that this T. V. A. which we instituted a short time ago is reaching out with an avaricious appetite to get public funds and devote this money to the socialization of the industry of the United States. Some of us who come from coal-producing districts have already felt the effect of the T. V. A. in our districts, and I predict that we will soon feel it more if the integrity of the House bill is not preserved.

When the members of the Committee on Military Affairs brought out this legislation, we tried our level best to do justice to the T. V. A. Board and to the people of the United States. It was what all legislation should be—a compromise. In this legislation we endeavored to hedge this Board of academic college professors of theoretical minds with the restrictions that should hedge every department in this Government. We endeavored to put them under the control of the Comptroller General of the United States and endeavored to provide that their purchases, their expenditures, and all of their affairs should go through the customary channels through which the affairs of all the other bureaus of the Government pass.

We still believe that this bill should be passed as we brought it out of committee, and the members of the committee reported out the bill with that thought in mind. We were endeavoring to do something for the T. V. A. and at the same time rectify what we permitted to be passed 2 years ago when the Senate bill was rammed down our throats.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Is it not true that this bill would never have been reported out of the committee if certain amendments had not been accepted by the members of that committee?

Mr. FADDIS. That is true. There was an agreement by the majority of the members of the Military Affairs Committee to bring this bill out for consideration. When the statement is made on the floor of this House that a great many of the members of that committee voted to bring this bill out only in order to get it before the House, that is entirely erroneous. We voted to report this bill out because we believed in this kind of a bill, and for no other reason. I did not vote to report this bill out in order that it might be brought on the floor of the House to be made a political football. I never would vote to bring any bill out of committee for that purpose.

So I appeal to the Members of the House to carefully judge and weigh these amendments, to think before you vote on them and grant this Bureau powers that no other bureau connected with this Government has, and powers that no bureau should have, in connection with the spending of the money of the people. [Applause.] We are the representatives of the people and are responsible for the spending of their money.

I believe in the T. V. A. as we originally established it. I believe in it especially as a yardstick with which to measure utility rates. What we must have, however, is an honest yardstick, not a fictitious one. This we cannot have unless we insure that they are properly hedged by regulations and obliged to comply with a proper system of accounting.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I listened this morning to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] in opposition to the T. V. A. He does not seem to realize what the T. V. A. means to the people of his own State. A few days ago I put into the RECORD a statement showing that the people of Missouri are overcharged for electric light and power $20,000,000 a year, of which at least $1,600,000 is piled onto the shoulders of the people of the district he represents.

They have talked here of the T. V. A. yardstick. In this compilation I not only used 1 yardstick, I included at least 4 yardsticks, and possibly a half dozen yardsticks, and nine-tenths of your districts under these yardsticks are being overcharged more under the Tacoma or the Winnipeg or the Ontario rates than they would be under the T. V. A. rates. Take the statement put into the RECORD from the records of the city of Jacksonville, Fla., where they have cheaper rates than in the average town where you live, and where they sold $2,600,000 worth of electricity last year and made a profit of $1,800,000, if they had done as Winnepeg, the T. V. A., Tacoma, and Ontario are doing, and had given the consumers the benefit of that profit, they would have been able to sell power in Jacksonville, Fla., manufactured from oil from Texas or coal from Pennsylvania, much cheaper than they are selling it in the Tennessee Valley.

Why, the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON] and these other gentlemen from coal districts are complaining that this is competing with them, and they say it will stop the use of coal. I have gone into this question thoroughly, and under ordinary conditions I am going to concede there will be very little difference in the cost of electricity when it is manufactured with coal and when it is manufactured with water power. Let me say to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], whose people are overcharged in that State more than $8,000,000 a year for electric lights and power, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS], whose people are overcharged $75,000,000 a year for electric light and power. that these coal barons are lined up with the Power Trust in this fight while coal is piled up at the mines that could be turned into electric energy at rates provided by the T. V. A. yardstick and sold to those people. This is what the yardstick is for.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I have no time to yield.

But in the coal-mining districts of Kentucky, of Pennsylvania, of West Virginia, and Alabama these poor miners come out from the depths of the earth, sweaty and tired, and go to their homes and are denied enough electric energy to even run a fan, much less a refrigerator. Some of them are not able to properly light their humble homes, the rates are so high. If this coal were turned into power and sold at the rates provided by the T. V. A. yardstick, it would more than double the consumption, and you would have a market for your coal and would add to the comforts of the people who need it most. You are simply working against the interests of those people who are today digging the coal from your mines and are denied the use of the electricity that could be produced by it.

You are lining up, unconsciously perhaps, with the Power Trust to deny these people one of the greatest blessings of modern civilization—a liberal use of electric energy.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to know whether the gentleman is going to yield to some questions with reference to the statements he is making. I shall not object.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I want my friend Mr. KELLER over there to have time. He has been trying for an hour to get time.

Mr. KELLER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object; but we must make some progress in the reading of the bill, and unless we can have an agreement that this general discussion shall conclude in 10 or 15 minutes we shall be obliged to move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in that time.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to have 3 minutes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] asks unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FORD of California. Will the gentleman from Mississippi tell me whether the coal industry has ever justified its existence in view of the terrific conditions that have always existed among coal workers?

Mr. RANKIN. They are not justifying it now. That is what I am coming to, and this additional time has given me an opportunity to locate my distinguished friend from West Virginia [Mr. EDMISTON]. The people of West Virginia are being burdened with power rates that are outrageously high, and yet they are hauling coal from West Virginia to the District of Columbia and manufacturing and selling power for about one-half of what they have to pay in West Virginia.

The District of Columbia is served by a private power company, a private enterprise. They are free from a holding company, although I am told they pay their president $25,000 a year, yet they bring coal from West Virginia and from Pennsylvania with which to produce it, and sell electricity for half of what they sell it for in Pennsylvania, although they have no industrial load here and have to depend entirely upon commercial and domestic consumption. [Applause.]

I say to the gentleman from West Virginia that he is standing in the way of his own coal industry. I do not care whether you can make electricity cheaper by coal or waterpower, I am for bringing the rates down to a proper yardstick.

They have reduced the power rates $350,000,000 in this country, and that is the reason the Power Trust is complaining. What I am trying to do is to bring the power rates down all over the country so that they can use the coal from West Virginia and Pennsylvania in the right way. If they will do that it will furnish power and light to West Virginia, Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and Alabama as cheaply as it is furnished by the T. V. A., if not cheaper.

Do not forget, gentlemen, that every man that turns on a light is watching Congress today.

Mr. EDMISTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. EDMISTON. The gentleman's comparison of West Virginia and the company operating in the District of Columbia is unfair, for this reason: There are as many living in the 10-mile square of the District of Columbia as we have in the whole State of West Virginia. The District of Columbia does not have to distribute its current over anything like the territory that we have.

Mr. RANKIN. There is a town of 60,000 people in West Virginia, the town of Charleston. On January 1, 1935, they were charging $2 for 25 kilowatt-hours, where they charge 75 cents in the T. V. A. area. Your people are being robbed by the Power Trust, and we are trying to give them relief. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Much has been said during the last few minutes relative to the fair yardstick being used by the T. V. A. for the sale of electrical energy to the consumer. A few days ago, during the discussion of the utilities holding company bill, I called to the attention of the House some of the advantages that the T. V. A. has over private utilities, and I repeat again today what they are:

No measure of overhead and general expense of the Federal Government; no financing expense, no interest charges except that they might have to pay 3½ percent on moneys while private utilities have to pay 6½ percent on the same; no insurance charges, the Government carries the risk; no State or Federal workmen's compensation to pay; no real-estate tax to pay; no automobile taxes to pay; no gasoline taxes to pay; no 3-percent special Federal utility tax to pay; no Federal or State income tax to pay; no corporation tax to pay, and in the new tax bill which is being contemplated and will be before the House in a few days for consideration we are expected to raise corporation taxes up to 17 percent. The T. V. A. has no corporation tax to pay and has the advantage of rebates on railroads for both freight and passenger service, free postage under the Government franking privilege, free legal counsel, free use of other Government departments, free use of office rooms in Federal buildings; together with immunity from expense for regulation, keeping its own accounts to suit its own purposes, including the charge-off on power costs to social uplift, navigation, improvements, and so forth.

I submit to the House that there is not a public utility in the United States that can live under such competition as that, and I say that this yardstick which they are talking about, this untruthful rubber yardstick by which the price of electrical energy shall be measured by the T. V. A., is unfair and un-American. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I represent the best developed and largest producing soft-coal district in the United States, the Twenty-fifth District of Illinois. It has the largest and best-developed mines in the entire world. I am 100 percent for the bill that is before this House when properly amended by the four amendments to be proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. [Applause.] The justification of my position lies here: We have been afraid all of the time that water power would put coal out of business. We are afraid only because we do not know the facts. It has been a question for my investigation during my economic studies for many years. In the last 3 or 4 weeks, anticipating these bills coming along, I have secured information for this House which, if I am permitted to present, will compel every man to admit that the best thing that can happen to the coal industry of the country is to put through the T. V. A. to the fullest power and extent. I have no illusions about this. I have no feeling in the case. It is purely a matter of economics, a matter of common sense, and nothing else.

If the water power is sufficient to supply any large part of the power needed, there might be something to it. But what are the facts? Long ago it was brought out in this country by the great engineer Steinmetz that if every drop of water that fell within the borders of the United States could be used to absolute perfection, the entire rainfall, it could supply only 30 percent of the heat actually in use at that time, and a much less proportion of what we are now using. What part of that possible 30 percent can be produced economically?

At the present time about 7 percent of the entire electrical current in the country is produced from water power, and no more. You can add to that 7 percent another 3 percent, of water power, but you cannot add another single percent beyond that, economically. Therefore, we are faced with this proposition: If we are to use only the electricity we are using now, we can supply only 10 percent of it from water power. Laying aside the use of oil and gas for producing electric current, which, of course, is only of temporary importance, we face only one possibility of supplying the tremendous amount of power necessary in this country to do the great work that is facing us, not the little work now, but the great work of producing vastly more wealth than we have heretofore produced. We cannot do that unless we provide the proper power for that purpose, because at the bottom of all our industries lies the use of power, and that use depends on the cost of that power. I repeat what I said the other day, that the one biggest big business in this country in years to come is to be the production and distribution of electrical power, and nothing less than that. What are the sources? Ten percent water power when it is fully developed economically, and no more. What other source have we? The first thing that we must have in justifiable investment is permanence, so that we can calculate on an investment today and see what it is going to be 20 years from now, not what it would be in 1 or 2 years. What is that source of power? Just one. That is the great source of the soft coal of this country, because from that source we have in sight at the present time enough to supply our entire needs for 5,000 years to come within the borders of the United States alone. [Applause.]

Let us note that temporarily the oil, and the gas arising from oil deposits, is cutting a small figure in the present production of power—about 5 percent—so that at present the total power outside that produced by coal is about 12 percent. The geologists estimate that even at this rate the oil and gas will be exhausted within another 15-year period. As prosperity returns, naturally a higher use than that for producing electric current will be found for the wonderful oils which nature has stored in the bowels of the earth. Then the common sense of conservation will prevent any great use of this supply except for the higher purposes of industry.

The production of power at a reasonable rate is a national question—one that will affect every individual in America. It lies at the very foundation of all industry, and the success or failure of industry depends primarily upon obtaining what we now call "cheap" electric current, as compared with the present rates, but what we ought to refer to as "reasonable" rates for electricity.

To illustrate what I am driving at: In actual practice, by the use of soft coal under reasonable conditions, electric current can be produced at 3 mills per kilowatt-hour on an average. To illustrate what this might mean, let us take into consideration that the 40 southern counties of Illinois, where the holding companies are in supreme control, the average rate to consumer is a fraction above 7 cents per kilowatt-hour what costs 3 mills to produce.

Of course, American manufacturing cannot compete with such electric rates as this when, notably in Germany, the production of electric current from soft coal is made on the basis as low as 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour, as it also can be produced under extraordinary conditions in our own country.

We, therefore, face this first question: How are we going to enter into competition with foreign industry in the foreign markets? The answer is obviously that we must first have electric rates as cheap as those available in foreign countries. It, therefore, resolves itself primarily into the production and distribution of electrical current at what we now consider a very low rate, but which, I repeat, is a fair rate under normal conditions.

We are not going to remain poor, unemployed, and inactive. If we were, our present production might largely suffice. Quite on the contrary, we are going to proceed with the creation and distribution of wealth in this country far beyond what we have done heretofore. Our very first step is to provide the basic elements of power under such conditions as to enable us to compete with other nations.

If our public-utilities concerns had from the beginning sought to serve the people at large and had been satisfied with a reasonable profit, there would have been no necessity for T. V. A. or for the coming coal authority, or any other governmental stimulus to power production.

The public-utility concerns have only themselves to thank for the coming of the competition which their outrageous prices have compelled the American people to seek. It has been the mistake of the public-utility companies to charge "all that the traffic would bear." Instead of coming into the court of humanity with clean hands, and offering to produce and distribute power at such rates as the engineers of the world know would be sufficiently profitable, they still might largely retain their former position. Not only are they unwilling to do this but they are using every means to maintain control along with prices which are commercially impossible. Industrial America cannot and will not permit any group to limit and impoverish industry and deny occupation to men.

The next question arises—what will be the effect of lower rates of electricity? Where the rates have been cut in two there has not been an increase merely, but a multiplication in the use of electrical current. That a much greater decrease than 50 percent can be made in many instances there is no doubt at all. In view of the coming rural electrification, and the completion of the electrification of the very partially electrified villages and cities; in view of the certainty that we are going to place our increases in manufacturing away from the present centers, all of which power must be supplied from new installations, it is justifiable to say that as soon as we can arrange for this development the amount of electric current which will be used will be a multiplication of all of the present electrical power, certainly a minimum of four times our present output.

All that current must be produced from soft coal of this country, and when we can arrive at that point of development it will not be a question of giving jobs to men in the coal mines but of getting enough men to fill the jobs which the new economy of plenty will bring about in this country. It should be suggestive, at least, that the miners' organizations are aware of these facts and are not opposing the T. V. A. Many believe in that development as one of the necessary steps toward bringing about the liberation of industry from those powers which have for years been exploiting it. Every coal field, favorably located and with favorable mining conditions, will receive a great impetus in the production of power as soon as electricity can be provided at reasonable rates.

As will be seen, the present proportion of current produced from water power and oil and gas is about 12 percent. But that is the limit that can be produced from those sources, and by the time water power has arrived at its full-grown development of 10 percent, the percentage of fuel oil and gas for production of electric current will have been discontinued. The other 90 percent must and will come from our 5,000-year supply of soft coal. When we multiply the present electric output, that entire increase must come from that soft coal. That will, of course, decrease the proportionate supply from water power.

It is fortunate for every coal mine and every coal miner, as well as for every American citizen, that the T. V. A. has opened our eyes to what electricity is to mean to the industry of this country. We should loyally support the T. V. A. development, learn from it, profit greatly from it as we are doing already. We should understand perfectly that the American people as yet do not, to any large extent, want public ownership. But the present utility companies on the other hand should also understand that if they continue to refuse fair rates and fair treatment, the people will, when compelled to, take charge of their own business. Because in fact as well as in theory all public utilities are but the agents of the people, empowered by them to carry on the people's business for them. And when those agents refuse to do their work well, the people have full power to remove those agents and do as they please with their own business.

We are making a fight for the coal industry at the present time. The achievements of the T. V. A. are its best guaranty of success. The man who fails to see the interrelation, the interdependence of the two, with the enormous increase in the use of soft coal, with the coming cheap rates, is overlooking the best interest of the coal mines, the coal miners, and the whole industry of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] have 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee has fixed the time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] is recognized for the remaining 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to look at this yardstick and talk about it a little so that the Members of the House, when they vote on this bill, will know what kind of a yardstick is being put up to them to measure the cost of producing electric power.

At the present time the revenue from this outfit, with approximately $50,000,000 chargeable to power, according to their own story, is $163,000 a year. It is estimated by the Tennessee Valley Authority, Mr. Lilienthal and Dr. Morgan, that at the end of 1940 there will be $192,000,000 invested in power and dams, and that the gross revenue—not the net revenue, but the gross revenue—will be $5,000,000. Those who have looked at power-operation figures know that the cost of operation and of distribution to get rid of $5,000,000 worth of power, with all that lay-out, is going to be four or five million dollars, and the net power revenue, after the distribution expense has been paid, is not going to be over a million dollars a year. With $192,000,000 invested, the depreciation charge must be eight or ten million dollars a year in any event, and it should be nearer $15,000,000. That means that the net loss, before interest is taken into consideration, is going to be nine or ten million dollars, if it is figured right and if it is figured honestly. When we figure interest at 3 percent that means $6,000,000 more, and the net loss is going to be fifteen or sixteen million dollars a year.

Now, let me say to you that as you vote on these questions, the yardstick that is established, whether it is an honest yardstick to the taxpayers of the United States is going to be the question. The people of the United States, the people who pay taxes every time they go to a movie or every time there is anything that they do which is subject to a tax in the United States, are going to watch you and they are going to know whether you are setting up an honest yardstick or whether you are setting up a yardstick that robs the taxpayers of the United States as this proposal which Dr. Morgan and Mr. Lilienthal have set up. We must put some sense into our operations. We must protect the taxpayers of the United States against this operation. We must establish an honest yardstick, where they charge rates which are commensurate with the expense to which the taxpayers are put, and not one that will burden our taxpayers with an additional ridiculous charge.

I think we ought to be very careful how we proceed in this matter. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That subdivision (j) of said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(j) Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries as, in conjunction with Wilson Dam, Norris Dam, Wheeler Dam, and Pickwick Landing Dam (hereafter to be known as 'Percy Quin Dam'), now under construction, the Aurora Dam, and the other dams enumerated in the report of the Chief of Engineers, March 15, 1930 (H. Doc. No. 328, 71st Cong., 2d sess.), and authorized by act of Congress approved July 3, 1930 (Public, No. 520, 71st Cong.), will provide with a 9-foot channel in the said river and maintain a water supply for the same from Knoxville to its mouth, and will best serve to promote navigation on the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi River drainage basins; and shall have power to acquire or construct power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines. The directors of the Authority are hereby directed to include in their next annual report their recommendations for the unified development of the Tennessee River system."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: Page 2, line 14, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. That subdivision (j) of said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'(j) Shall have power to construct such dams and reservoirs in the Tennessee River and its tributaries as, in conjunction with Wilson Dam, and Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Landing Dams, now under construction, will provide a 9-foot channel in the said river and maintain a water supply for the same from Knoxville to its mouth, and will best serve to promote navigation on the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi River drainage basins; and shall have power to acquire or construct power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines.'"

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is not one of the so-called "vital" amendments which I placed in yesterday's RECORD, but it is important from the standpoint of making certain and clear that the intent that the Congress has in establishing a 9-foot channel in the Tennessee River is carried out.

The language of the amendment which I have offered is identical with the language carried in the bill offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCSWAIN], chairman of the committee, as he originally introduced the bill and as he introduced the bill in what we term the "compromise" form. It is also the same language as was in the bill that passed the Senate.

The difficulty about the language now in the bill and the reason I offer the amendment is, gentlemen will note that the language now in the bill refers to the engineer's report adopted in the River and Harbor Act approved July 3, 1930, in the Seventy-first Congress. That report was unfortunately adopted by the Congress, but should never have been, as it recommends low navigation dams on the Tennessee River instead of high dams for navigation, flood control, and power. If now we tie the dam construction in the Tennessee River in with the report recommending the construction of low navigation dams, we will cause confusion and all kinds of trouble.

What I have offered in my amendment is the language of the bill as drafted by the engineers and lawyers of the Tennessee Valley Authority, as passed by the Senate, and as introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. I notice the language of the bill as introduced contains, in line 19 of page 2, after the words "Pickwick Landing Dam", the phrase "hereafter to be known as 'Percy Quin Dam'", but that this latter phrase is not included in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It was not in the original bill.

Mr. McCORMACK. But it is in the bill as reported by the committee.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; it was in the bill as reported; and, of course, my amendment would be subject to an amendment to put in that language.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLTON. In the opinion of the gentleman, does the responsibility for the development and maintenance of the Tennessee River lodge with the Tennessee Valley Authority or with the Corps of Engineers?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. With the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. BOLTON. Does the gentleman think it proper to change an established policy in regard to the question of navigability?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. When we created the Tennessee Valley Authority they were charged with the responsibility of constructing the dams. They have control of the dams, and we thought they ought to have that responsibility.

Mr. BOLTON. I am talking about the question of navigability, the gentleman understands.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes; I understand. Yes; they have control as to all features.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. With reference to the flood-control feature, they have under contemplation a dam on the Ohio above Paducah at the junction of the Cumberland and the Tennessee. Would the T. V. A. have authority to construct that dam?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. On the Ohio River?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; the Tennessee Valley Authority is limited to dams on the Tennessee River and its tributaries.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This involves the Cumberland, the Tennessee, and the Ohio Rivers above Paducah, which could be construed to come within that field.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The Tennessee Valley Authority has jurisdiction only in the Tennessee River and its tributaries.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. This bill and the gentleman's amendment are confined to the Tennessee River and its tributaries.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Both are covered by the amendment and the pending bill.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The basic act, of course, takes in only the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and that is all this bill takes into consideration.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. In a few words, just what is the difference between the gentleman's amendment and the language stricken out?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The only difference is that the section I have stricken out refers to the engineers' report. As I have said, this report was made in the year 1930, before the Tennessee Valley Authority was conceived, and many of the recommendations in the report are based on the construction of low-navigation dams rather than high-navigation, flood control, and power dams; and we have adopted the policy down there in the Tennessee Valley of constructing high dams.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, one object in setting up the Tennessee Valley Authority was to control navigation and stream flow.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Heretofore that has always been left with the Board of Engineers.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; the basic Tennessee Valley Act placed the construction of all these dams in the Tennessee Valley Authority. There is no change from the basic act so far as this section is concerned, except it specifies that there must be a 9-foot channel.

Mr. SNELL. I know, but under preceding acts it was always left with the Army engineers.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; not under the basic Tennessee Valley Act.

Mr. SNELL. I mean in all acts before the Tennessee Valley Act.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Before the Tennessee Valley Authority was established, of course, the gentleman's statement is right; the engineers were our only available source of authority on these rivers; they made the surveys of the rivers.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman is going to change that and give it to the Tennessee Valley Authority.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It has already been changed by the act of 1933.

Mr. SNELL. If it has already been changed, why is this additional legislation necessary?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It just perfects the basic act; that is all.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Boiled down to one sentence, the purpose of any legislation at all on this subject was to specify legislatively what was meant by navigability; and we specified that by saying that there shall be a 9-foot channel. That is all that is said.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. And in doing that is it not being changed from a navigation proposition to a power proposition?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; you are making it strictly navigation, undoubtedly.

Mr. SNELL. But you are doing it for that purpose.

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not think so. I think it is a navigation feature, pure and simple.

Mr. HARTER. Does the proposed amendment to section 2 of the House bill strike out the language on page 3, beginning in line 10?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. I put that in the amendment.

Mr. HARTER. That is included in the amendment?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is included in the amendment.

Mr. HARTER. So the directors of this project must make a report to Congress together with their recommendations?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The language in the amendment is identical with the language in the bill so far as that last sentence is concerned, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Is it necessary to have these high dams in order to get a 9-foot stream of water for navigation?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; it is not.

Mr. EATON. Then the high dams, as I understand it, are to be put there for power purposes only?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. It is necessary to have these high dams in order to get flood control as well as power.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. In connection with the language in the last sentence referred to, will the gentleman include in his remarks at this point the references to section 2 which appear in my supplemental report?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Does the gentleman mean to extend my remarks by putting in that information?

Mr. KVALE. Yes.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I shall be glad to do so. I want to say on this floor that the construction of the Aurora Dam for which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GREGORY] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TURNER] have worked and labored so long and so valiantly is authorized. I cannot yield further.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit and will undertake to show to my colleagues that the navigation-improvement plan adopted in the River and Harbor Act, approved July 3, 1930, providing for a navigable depth of 9 feet at low water from the mouth of the Tennessee River to Knoxville by building 32 low dams—unless power companies came forward and proposed to build high dams under the Federal Water Power Act—was, in the light of subsequent facts and events, an incredible mistake.

The River and Harbor Act of July 3, 1930, authorized appropriations of $5,000,000 for the prosecution of this work of building low dams. In a communication dated December 7, 1931, to the Secretary of War, which he transmitted to Congress, the Chief of Engineers requested an additional authorization of $17,500,000, making a total of $22,500,000 for building eight of these low navigation dams between the head of Colbert Shoals and Hales Bar Lock and Dam below Chattanooga. The additional authorization of $17,500,000 requested by the Chief of Engineers for this work was not granted by Congress. However, out of funds provided in the Reconstruction Finance Act and allocated for river and harbor work, the Chief of Engineers started the construction of a lock—designed for 9-foot navigation—at the Wheeler Dam site. The construction of this lock was the first step toward the completion of a costly and irreparable mistake. Happily, President Roosevelt corrected the mistake made by Congress in adopting the policy of building 32 low dams on the Tennessee River, and the reason I press the facts about this matter upon the attention of my colleagues is that I, after as sober thought as I can give the matter, greatly fear that if the House refuses to pass the amendments to the T. V. A. Act which the President desires, we are going to make another fearful mistake about the Tennessee River, and one which the President cannot correct for us.

After the President's visit to Muscle Shoals in January 1933, he ordered that the low lock then building at the Wheeler Dam site be redesigned for a high dam. This was done, and in due course the President ordered the Wheeler Dam built. The Membership of the House knows, without further detail, Mr. Chairman, that the President has abandoned the building of 32 low navigation dams on the Tennessee River and proposes to build, instead of these low dams, 7 high dams and locks between the mouth of the Tennessee River and Knoxville, Tenn.

Just as briefly as possible, and with as few detail figures as possible, let us make an estimate of what the President saved the taxpayers of the country by adopting the high-dam plan instead of the low-dam plan adopted by Congress.

The engineers' estimate and report, based upon their experience in operating similar low dams on the Ohio River, that it will cost $40,000 per year for maintenance and operation of each of the 32 low dams. Therefore, the annual cost for maintenance and operation of the 32 low dams would be $1,280,000. The annual cost of maintaining and operating the seven high dams would be $40,000 each, or a total of $280,000 annually. The difference between the cost of maintaining and operating the 32 low dams and 7 high dams would therefore be $1,000,000 annually. In 50 years the saving would be $50,000,000, and in 100 years the saving would be $100,000,000 in the cost of maintenance and operation.

Let us assume, for the purposes of this discussion and without claiming precision for the figures, that the cost of building seven high dams for navigation only, with no power installation, will be $20,000,000 each, making a total of $140,000,000. The Government at the end of 100 years would have $140,000,000 invested in the building of seven high dams for navigation only, all without interest and no sinking fund, and would have also invested $28,000,000 as the expense of maintaining and operating seven high dams for 100 years, making a total investment in the seven high dams in 100 years of $168,000,000.

The 32 low dams are estimated by the engineers to cost a total of $75,000,000. The cost of maintenance and operation of 32 low dams for 100 years would be $128,000,000, and at the end of 100 years the Government would have invested in the 32 low dams as the cost of construction and operation a total of $203,000,000. Therefore, at the end of 100 years this shows that the Government would have $35,000,000 less invested in the high dams and locks, for navigation only, than the Government would have invested in 32 low dams and locks for navigation only. In other words, in 100 years the Government would save $35,000,000 by building the high dams, or $350,000 per year; and, Mr. Chairman, the high dams, without power, would give flood control, and the low dams would provide no flood control.

Let us consider what the President saved in one item only by ordering the high dam built at the Wheeler Dam site. The power companies offered the Government in 1926, $600,000 annually for the increase in primary power at the Wheeler Dam, due to the regulated flow of the river in dry seasons, available by the building of the Norris Dam. This saving, by building the high Wheeler Dam, would amount to $30,000,000 in 50 years and $60,000,000 in 100 years.

Col. Hugh L. Cooper, in a letter to former Congressman McKenzie, Chairman of the Coolidge Muscle Shoals Commission, stated that the regulation benefits created by building such a dam as the Pickwick Landing Dam would be worth about $1,000,000 a year to the utility power operations of the Wilson Dam. Colonel Tyler, the engineer-adviser to the Hoover Muscle Shoals Commission, in 1931 definitely and in detail confirms Colonel Cooper's statement.

It is, indeed, worth while to say that Colonel Tyler, conservative in his report almost to the point of unfairness, estimated that in 5 years a public utility could afford to pay an annual rental for existing properties at Muscle Shoals of about $1,600,000 per annum in addition to all costs of operation. Colonel Tyler says, however, that if and when a navigation or power dam is built in the vicinity of Colberts Shoals—and this means Pickwick Landing Dam—that the Wilson Dam can be operated at peak load, and that the net rental value to the public utility of Wilson Dam, above all costs of operation, would be approximately $3,000,000 a year. You will note, Mr. Chairman, that Colonel Tyler estimates the regulating value of the pool created by the Pickwick Landing Dam as worth $1,400,000 a year.

Under the T. V. A. Act the President ordered the Norris Dam built. It therefore is very important for the House to remember—to recall the fact—that the power companies in 1926 offered the Government $1,200,000 annually for the benefits of flow regulation at Wilson Dam from the Norris Dam.

My colleagues, let us keep books together in behalf of the taxpayers, for next to national defense the taxpayers should have first consideration by us on the Tennessee River.

With Norris Dam built, Wheeler Dam built, and Pickwick Landing Dam built—and they are all building under the order of the President—there will be an increased rental value at the Wheeler Dam by building Norris Dam of $600,000 a year, and this was the offer made by the power companies for Norris Dam benefits in 1926, and there will be an increased rental value of $1,200,000 at the Wilson Dam from regulated flow by building the Norris Dam; and there will be an increased rental value of $1,000,000 or more at the Wilson Dam power station from the regulating pool created by the Pickwick Landing Dam and the total of all these increased revenue or rental values from regulation benefits only amount to $2,800,000 annually. Let us, Mr. Chairman, call it $3,000,000, and according to Colonel Tyler's figures, that will be very conservative.

It would be a reflection upon the intelligence of the Membership of this House for me to offer further figures proving that Congress made a frightful mistake in 1930 in adopting the 32 low-dam projects for the improvement of navigation of the Tennessee River.

Mr. Chairman and my colleagues, who corrected the great mistake which Congress made in adopting the low-dam projects on the Tennessee River? Nobody, Mr. Chairman, except President Franklin D. Roosevelt himself. What reward—what thanks—what tribute—what courtesy—has the President received for his great constructive statesmanship in saving the United States Congress from criticism in the future by correcting our mistakes? Instead of the President—as he greatly merits—being highly rewarded—instead of expressing gratitude to him in the name of the taxpayers of the country, whom we represent here, the President is denounced for ordering the Norris Dam built, and the entire Norris Dam project is declared to be a shameful waste. The President's reward and the thanks he gets for ordering dams built which will yield, from regulation benefits only, $3,000,000 increased revenues or rental values annually at the Wilson Dam and Wheeler Dam—and $3,000,000 is 3 percent on $100,000,000—is that when the President asks the House to provide for $100,000,000 of bonds in the T. V. A. Act, the President and the Tennessee Valley Authority are told that they can only have $50,000,000 of bonds. When the President asks for amendments to the T. V. A. Act that will aid him and the Authority to make it possible for the Authority to operate the Wilson-Wheeler-Pickwick Landing Dam projects so that these increased earnings and rental values may be realized, the President and the directors of the Authority are, by some, denounced and defamed.

Mr. Chairman, what would 435 sound businessmen—taxpayers—assembled together, as we are, say to the President and to the Authority in reply to these requested amendments to the T. V. A. Act? These taxpayers would want to know what rate of interest and on what amount of capital the President and the Authority proposed to pay the Government. They would ask, "Do you ever expect to pay back to the Government any part or all of the cost of building these navigation, flood-control, power dams?" If these taxpayers were told by the Authority that they can pay 3 percent on 40 percent of the total cost of each project, and by way of an annual compound interest sinking fund would pay back the entire cost of each project, say, in a period of 60 years, these taxpayers would say, "Well, if you can do that, we will furnish you the money." If somebody got up in the taxpayers' convention and called attention to the criticism of the President and the Authority and detailed the various faults of the directors, as has been detailed before our committee and will be detailed in this debate in the House, those hard-headed, business-minded taxpayers would say, "All those things you are now telling us about are just peccadillos"; and the peccadillo speaker would be voted out.

These taxpayers would be keenly interested when shown that by stream flow and pool regulation $3,000,000 increased revenues could be earned annually. You would find these old taxpayers sharpening their pencils and figuring what these increased earnings at all of the dams below the mouth of the Clinch would amount to annually, if the increased earnings from Norris Dam regulation amount to $1,200,000 at the Wilson Dam, and $600,000 at the Wheeler Dam, and $1,000,000 a year at the Wilson Dam from Pickwick Landing Pool regulation.

These taxpayers would ask, "Well, what will be the increased primary power, say, at Hales Bar due to stream regulation from the Norris Reservoir?" They would be told, of course, that the sustained primary power at Hales Bar during the dry season would not be less than 40,000 horsepower. The interest of these taxpayers would grow keener, and they would insist upon being told what the total increased revenues would amount to by stream regulation at all of the eight dams below the mouth of the Clinch River. Mr. Chairman, the Authority would probably tell these taxpayers that the total benefits from Cove Creek regulation at all the dams below the mouth of the Clinch River could not at present be accurately stated but that the total would probably be not less than 250,000 horsepower.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot tell the House what the total will be, because I do not know, but if it is as much as 250,000 horsepower, then these taxpayers would scratch their heads and use their pencils again, and when they found that the increased earnings or rental value might amount to more than $4,000,000 a year—or even $3,000,000 a year, and $3,000,000 a year would be 3 percent on $100,000,000—these taxpayers would say to the Authority directors, "Well, they say you have been guilty of some peccadillos, and all we have got to say to you is, Cut out as many of your peccadillos as you can, and don't allow any big peccadillos—we won't grumble about a few little ones." These taxpayers would pay to the T. V. A. directors, "We will ask our Representatives in the House to pass the amendments to the T. V. A. Act which you have requested."

If it were pointed out to these taxpayers in convention that the difference between the maintenance and operation of 17 low-navigation dams and 3 high-power navigation dams between Chattanooga and Knoxville, is the difference between $680,000 a year and $120,000 a year, and that with the low dams there would be 17 lockages for boats between Knoxville and Chattanooga and only 3 lockages with the high dams, and that the low dams would furnish no power, and no flood control, and that 2 of these dams would lose the value of regulated flow from Cove Creek, these taxpayers would be asking right away, "Well, who ever proposed to build these low dams and waste the power and lose the flood control?"

These taxpayers would have to be told that the Congress of the United States approved the building of these low dams, but that President Roosevelt had ordered the high dams built, and then forthwith these old taxpayers would applaud Mr. Roosevelt, and they would appoint a committee and instruct that committee to go to the President and tell him that they approved his T. V. A. program, and that they would ask their own representatives in the House to vote for all the amendments which he desired.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not even intimate that the Members of the House cannot fairly and justly say that Congress, in approving the low-dam navigation project plan on the Tennessee, did not have the unqualified recommendation of the engineers; but, even so, Mr. Chairman, we should not be less grateful to the President for correcting our mistake by ordering the high-dam plan adopted.

The President, when at the Wheeler Dam in December last year, did not criticize Congress for adopting the low-dam project. The President, with that consideration and modesty which so "becometh a great man", said in substance that when he went back to Washington after his visit to Muscle Shoals in January 1933 he ordered a high lock built for a high dam at the Wheeler Dam site.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are any Members of the House who are still in favor of the incredibly wasteful low-dam plan instead of the profitable high-dam plan adopted by the President, then those Members who are still for the low-dam plan are in precise agreement with the witnesses put on the stand by the power company's attorneys in Judge Grubb's court, who, without batting an eye and without a blush of shame, testified for the power companies that the low-dam plan was a cheaper plan for the Government than was the high-dam plan. There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the power companies wanted the high dams built, and as soon as the opportunity was presented to them they applied for all of the power dams which the engineers had reported upon and located north of Chattanooga on the main stream up to Knoxville, and all the power dams on the Clinch. What they mean is that if they are not permitted to have these power-navigation dams, if and when they desire to develop power at them, they are opposed to the building of these navigation power dams at all. They are determined to defeat, if possible, President Roosevelt's plan to build these high dams by the Government for the national security of the Nation and for the social and industriai welfare of the people of this country.

Mr. Chairman, with the indulgence of the House, I desire to remind all my colleagues, for their most serious consideration and sober reflection, of what Col. Hugh L. Cooper stated at a hearing on February 17, 1922, before the Committee on Military Affairs, and I quote his statement with reference to the Ford offer:

> I would like to conclude this part of the statement by saying that as a net result of the proposition as it is written, Mr. Ford will be getting the cheapest power on the American Continent.

This statement by Colonel Cooper naturally raises the question, Where is the cheapest power on this continent and who owns it? Reflecting over this statement of Colonel Cooper's, I determined to try to locate the cheapest power on this continent, with the serious thought in mind that the nation on the American Continent which has the largest development and surplus of the cheapest power is best prepared for national defense, and that the nation which has the cheapest power can produce the cheapest aluminum, the cheapest magnesium metal, the cheapest high-tensile alloy steels, such as stainless steels, all so necessary and indispensable now to national defense and so necessary for the most economic solution of our aircraft, rail, highway, and water transportation problems.

Mr. Chairman, I truly believe that my findings will interest every Member of this House, and I sincerely hope that my findings will cause every Member of this House, upon sober reflection, to decide as I have decided, that we owe it to ourselves and to the people we represent here, and to the national defense of our country to take a new and enlarged view of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act and highly resolve among ourselves to measure up to the President's intellectual and statesmanlike conception of what the Tennessee River and the T. V. A. really mean to the future of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, before giving the House the results of my researches with reference to the question of the cheapest power on the American continent, I think it would be informing and useful to the Members of the House to briefly tell them that Colonel Cooper has been a consulting engineer for more than 30 years. He has built several water powers in different parts of the world, and he built one at Niagara Falls; he built the Keokuk Dam and power project on the Mississippi at Keokuk, Iowa; and one at McCalls Ferry, Pa.; one in Brazil; one in Chile; several in Canada; and he was the consulting engineer for the Government at Muscle Shoals during the building of the Wilson Dam, and finally, to crown his career, he built the great water power on the Dneiper River in Russia.

My investigations disclose that power costs 3 mills per kilowatt-hour at the Alcoa Tenn., aluminum plant, and this power is furnished from the Aluminum Co.'s power developments on the Little Tennessee River. Mr. Davis, of the Aluminum Co., stated before our committee in a recent hearing that power at Alcoa costs 3 mills per kilowatt-hour, and this confirmation of the results of my own researches causes me to have confidence in other rates for power which my researches disclosed.

Dr. Mantell, of the Pratt Institute, Brooklyn, N. Y., in his books, Sparks from the Electrode, gives a list of the cost of power at different important power development points in different countries of the world. At the Arvida aluminum plant, in the Province of Quebec, Canada, Dr. Mantell reports the power supplying this plant from the Saguenay River power development of the Aluminum Co. costs 1 to 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour. He says power costs 1½ mills at Shawinigan Falls, Province of Quebec, Canada. Also, Dr. Mantell says that in Ontario, Canada, power costs as low as 1½ mills. He gives rates for hydropower in many other places in other countries ranging from 2 mills to 3½ mills per kilowatt-hour.

I will omit further details of rates on power and briefly report to the House that the most interesting discovery I made in my researches is that the Aluminum Trust, through its subsidiary, the Alcoa Co., Ltd., Quebec, Canada, owns the great power development on the Saguenay River, known as the "Shipshaw Chute a Caron", with 260,000 horsepower installation, and with an ultimate power installation planned of 1,260,000 horsepower, and this power costs not over 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour.

There has been installed by the Shawinigan Water & Power Co., a subsidiary of the Aluminum Trust, at three power sites on the St. Maurice River, Province of Quebec, 779,500 horsepower, with plans for increasing this installation up to 859,500 horsepower.

It therefore will be obvious that the Aluminum Trust has 260,000 horsepower installed on the Saguenay River serving power to the Arvida aluminum plant, ultimately to be the greatest aluminum plant in the world, and that the trust has installed 779,500 horsepower at Shawinigan Falls, Quebec, with plans for future installations up to a grand total of 2,119,500 horsepower at all of the developments of the Aluminum Trust on the Saguenay and St. Maurice Rivers, Province of Quebec, Canada.

None of this Aluminum Trust power in Quebec, Canada, costs more than 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour, but when the ultimate installations are completed on the Saguenay and St. Maurice Rivers it is reasonable and conservative to estimate that the Aluminum Trust's power in Canada at these Quebec developments will not cost more than 1 mill per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the Members of this House if they do not agree with me that this is most important information, and if they do not further agree that the important question at Muscle Shoals is, Can the T. V. A. produce power at the Wilson Dam, for example, as cheaply as the Aluminum Trust produces its power in Canada?

In connection with these power cost rates which I have given to the House I am sure it will be of interest to the Members of the House to know that Dr. Mantell, in his little Sparks from the Electrode, states that it requires 12 kilowatt-hours to produce a pound of aluminum; that it requires 13 kilowatt-hours to produce a pound of magnesium; that it requires 3,000 kilowatt-hours to produce a ton of carbide; and, mark you, my colleagues, he says that it requires 500 kilowatt-hours to produce a ton of electric steel.

Mr. Chairman, the House will note that Aluminum Trust power costs twice as much at Alcoa, Tenn., as it does at Arvida and Shawinigan Falls, Province of Quebec. In a word, the history of the power development on the Saguenay River and the building of the great aluminum plant at Arvida is that James B. Duke owned the Saguenay power and proposed to build an aluminum plant.

The Aluminum Trust became alarmed lest competition by Duke's plant might put an end to the Aluminum Co.'s monopoly, and the trust proposed to Duke the organization of an aluminum company in Canada, and that Duke join the Aluminum Co. of America in its monopoly, and that they not compete with each other. Happily—and I rejoice at it—my colleagues, if the T. V. A. can produce at Muscle Shoals as cheaply as the trust produces power on the Saguenay River, the way is pointed out to us to free the people in the United States from Mr. Mellon's aluminum monopoly.

Mr. Chairman, if power costs 3 mills per kilowatt-hour, the power to produce a ton of electric steel in an electric furnace would cost $15, but if power costs 1½ mills per kilowatt-hour, it would cost $7.50 to produce a ton of electric steel. According to press dispatches from Chicago, there has been a rustless, stainless steel coal car on exhibition at the Union Station in Chicago in the last 10 days. The point I desire to make will be so clear to you that I need not explain further.

It will interest the House, I feel sure, to know that France has the largest reserve deposits of bauxite ore of any country in the world, but Canada, with the cheapest power in the world, leads France in the production of aluminum. Pertinent to this point in my remarks is a dispatch which I read in the papers a few days ago that France had prohibited the export of aluminum and aluminum scrap to Germany.

Mr. Chairman, in the field of national defense, that country with the largest production of aluminum and with the cheapest water power to produce it is the best prepared for war—in the air, on the land, and on the sea.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the Members of the House will indulge me to say that I should have advised the House farther back and at the appropriate place in my remarks that the Aluminum Trust has installed at all of its developments for aluminum operations in the United States 526,455 horsepower, and has plans for future installations of approximately 200,000 horsepower.

From investigations I made in April and May 1933, and from information I secured which I believed then—and believe now—was reliable, I confidently believe that the T. V. A. can produce power at Muscle Shoals for 1 mill per kilowatt-hour. I do not mean that the Authority can do so now, that is impossible under the circumstances, but when some of their present developments have proceeded to completion and when they are permitted to do so by the power interests, I even believe the Authority will produce power at Muscle Shoals for less than 1 mill per kilowatt-hour.

Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to find how, in the careers of certain great statesmen of modern times, their names have been notably associated with waterways and canals. The crowning event that gives Disraeli's name the greatest renown as a statesman was his purchase of the Suez Canal shares from the Khedive of Egypt. The peak of Theodore Roosevelt's standing as one of the world's most illustrious statesmen was the building of the Panama Canal. Mr. Chairman, the time will come when the Wilson Dam will not be, as has been said, Wilson's folly, but Woodrow Wilson's fame.

Mr. Chairman, let me declare to you—and I like to declare it because I believe it—that if this House will perform its part, loyally supporting the President and the T. V. A., the T. V. A. and the Tennessee River will stand as the most brilliant accomplishment of the most brilliant statesman of our day and time—Franklin D. Roosevelt.

Mr. Chairman I have studiously—I have carefully—refrained from indulging in horse-power politics in my remarks to the House on this bill. I believe that the opponents of the amendments to the T. V. A. Act which the President desires are wrong and that those who oppose the President in this matter are more mistaken and are making a greater blunder than Congress did when it adopted the low-dam navigation improvement plan on the Tennessee River.

If, with the pathway of the Republican Party for the last 15 years lined and marked by Muscle Shoals skeletons, failures and defeats, the party still thinks it must stand by and with the power interests of this country against the people of the country, and continue to fight President Roosevelt's T. V. A. policies, and if the Republican Party, as has been intimated, insists upon making the Tennessee Valley Authority an issue in the next Presidential campaign, let them do it—

And damn'd be him that first cries, "Hold, enough!"

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FADDIS to the amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: After the words "Pickwick Landing Dam" insert the words "hereafter to be known as Percy Quin Dam."

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say in connection with the drafting of this bill that there was at least one amendment placed in the bill in which all of the Members were in hearty accord. It was placed in the bill by unanimous vote of the committee. That was the amendment to change the name of the Pickwick Landing Dam to Percy Quin Dam. The members of the committee considered it was a worthy tribute to a man who had spent 20 years of his life as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, a man who had been intensely interested in this proposition, and a man who was Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs at the time of his death. That is the reason this amendment was placed in the bill, and it was placed there by a unanimous vote of the committee. I hope the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] will accept this amendment to his amendment, and I believe he unintentionally omitted this part of the language of the bill in drafting his amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Having been in the midst of this fight for 12 or 14 years, and knowing of the activity of Percy Quin, deceased, and his interest in this legislation, I want to congratulate the gentleman on offering this amendment.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FADDIS. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. McSWAIN. I feel duty bound to make a statement in regard to Percy Quin, the great zeal he displayed, and his very effective labors in behalf of conserving the power at Muscle Shoals in the interest of the people.

In February 1932, shortly after he became Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and while holding hearings regarding a bill then relating to Muscle Shoals, he was stricken with a fatal malady of the heart. He was taken from the room by some of his colleagues, and the responsibility of conducting the hearings fell upon my shoulders. There was trouble in the committee. There has always been trouble in that committee. Mr. Quin sent word by his wife that I should come to the Naval Hospital to see him. He could not talk very much, but he held up his hand like this as he lay flat on his back and said: "Mac, tell the boys to stick by the faith."

I think a man who died with Muscle Shoals on his lips as the result of long years of struggle and effort in behalf of this great project ought to have his name and memory perpetuated in the way proposed by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] as amendment by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS].

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment as amended may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Hill of Alabama amendment as amended.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it must be perfectly obvious what the purpose of this amendment is. The members of the Committee on Military Affairs were impressed with the fact that the Tennessee Valley Authority had ignored the Congress and made no report. We have no knowledge of what their program is, what they intend to do, or in what manner they intend to do it. There was, however, available to the Congress of the United States the very excellent report of the Chief of Engineers, which was made at considerable expense. In an effort to bind these gentlemen to some sort of a program and some sort of orderly procedure we required them to follow the researches, the determinations, and recommendations of the Board of Engineers of the United States Army, which had been incorporated in the Rivers and Harbors Act of 1930.

This amendment which is proposed has for its purpose the elimination of any reference to that report of the Board of Engineers and to turn over to the Tennessee Valley Authority exclusive jurisdiction, judgment, and control. They will be themselves the judge of the engineering features of the undertaking without any regard to what has been done in the past by the Congress and the Board of Engineers.

Furthermore, the mention of these dams, the Pickwick Landing Dam, the Wheeler Dam, and the other dams, can have this effect. These dams were not authorized by Congress. The Authority was not authorized to build these dams. They proceeded on their own initiative to build them, and the recognition of these dams by this act of Congress validates all that has been done and confers upon the Tennessee Valley Authority powers far beyond anything we have ever given them before and makes them completely a free lance to use the moneys of the Treasury of the United States and bind the country to undertakings without limitation and beyond the control of the Congress. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McLEAN and Mr. SHORT) there were—ayes 138, noes 55.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new subdivision, (k), at the end of said section as follows:

"(k) At any time before the expiration of 5 years from the date when this section, as amended, becomes law may in the name of and as agent for the United States and subject to approval of the President, dispose of any of such real property as in the judgment of the Board may be no longer necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act, but no land shall be conveyed on which there is a permanent structure heretofore or hereafter built by or for the United States or the Authority."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: Page 3, line 14, strike out all language of section 3 and insert the following language:

"SEC. 3. That said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new subdivision, (k), at the end of said section as follows:

"(k) May at any time within 5 years from the date of this act, in the name of and as agent for the United States and subject to approval of the President, dispose of any of such real property as in the judgment of the Board may be no longer necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act, but no land shall be conveyed on which there is a permanent dam, hydraulic power plant, fertilizer plant, or munitions plant, heretofore or hereafter built by or for the United States or for the Authority."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, by way of explanation of why this amendment is desirable, you will observe that the language of the bill which was reported, in line 24, prohibits the conveyance of any land on which there is a permanent structure.

After the bill had been reported it was called to my attention that since it was necessary to relocate a great many roads through the construction of such dams as the Norris Dam at Cove Creek, it fell upon the Authority to establish new roads and to build bridges wherever necessary, and it was believed that there might be danger in this inhibition against the conveyance of any land on which there was a permanent structure and it might be interpreted that a road or a bridge that had been built in substitution for a road that had to be relocated, is a permanent structure and so could not be conveyed. For this reason we have proposed this amendment against the conveyance of land on which there is a dam or power house or a facility of that kind so as not to include a road or bridge.

This is the sole purpose of the amendment. It is only a perfecting amendment and I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That subdivision (c) of section 5 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"(c) To cooperate with National, State, district, or county experimental stations or demonstration farms, with farmers, landowners, and associations of farmers or landowners, for the use of new forms of fertilizer or fertilizer practices during the initial or experimental period of their introduction, and for promoting the prevention of soil erosion by the use of fertilizers and otherwise. The Board is also authorized to experiment in the extermination of noxious weeds and the destruction of plants injurious to agriculture by means of the application and use of chemicals and by other means appropriate to these purposes."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 4, line 9, strike out the last two words in line 9 and all of lines 10, 11, 12, and 13.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the language I propose to strike out is as follows:

The Board is also authorized to experiment in the extermination of noxious weeds and the destruction of plants injurious to agriculture by means of the application and use of chemicals and by other means appropriate to these purposes.

Just how this language came to be put into this bill I am unable to say. It is foreign to every purpose of the Tennessee Valley Authority. It is a duty of the Agricultural Department, which has exercised jurisdiction over it for many years.

It covers a subject for which we make appropriations every year for the Agricultural Department and the land-grant colleges and the experimental stations, covering noxious weeds throughout the United States and the methods of their destruction. At this session we appropriated $65,000 especially in the agricultural appropriation bill, part of which was to be used in cooperation with the T. V. A. in developing chemicals for the extermination of weeds. Just why they want to build up another vast department under the Tennessee Valley Authority I cannot see. Why should they do that when you have in the Agricultural Department the best corps of experts on this subject?

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The only reason I can see is that they wanted another avenue in which they might spend vast sums.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I am trying to give the House a chance to stop that.

Mr. LUCKEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. LUCKEY. I think I can give the gentleman information as to why that language was put in the bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman means the European morning glory?

Mr. LUCKEY. Yes.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me tell you something about the European morning glory. The land-grant college of Kansas for 9 years has been experimenting with the European morning glory. They published a bulletin covering their methods of dealing with it by chemicals. I have no objection to the Tennessee Valley Authority furnishing the Agricultural Department with chemicals, but let the investigation go on through the department that has been administering it for 50 years.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Let me finish this. There are hundreds of noxious weeds. We have the loco weed all over the West, for which we have made appropriations of thousands of dollars. There are the European morning glory and the Russian thistle. Why start this Authority spending money on something that our experts in the Department of Agriculture and in the various States are investigating every year?

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. Can the gentleman conceive of how this proposal to destroy weeds by poisonous gas or otherwise has any connection with national defense or the regulation of interstate commerce?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No.

Mr. McSWAIN. Nor can I.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And I cannot see how it has any connection with navigation, flood control, or the national defense under the Tennessee Valley Authority, and those are the main purposes of its organization.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will permit, I will tell him why this is in this bill.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It ought not to be in the bill.

Mr. RANKIN. Possibly not, but we have appealed for relief from the condition in that area of the United States and the Department of Agriculture has failed to give us relief. I refer to what is called "the bitterweed." It grows up and covers that country and it is costing millions of dollars every year by ruining milk and butter.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And we have spent a lot of money to exterminate it. I know about the bitterweed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I shall answer the question. I am familiar with the bitterweed. It kills some character of livestock. We had it in Texas, and we appealed to the Bureau of Animal Industry. They had the money. The Bureau of Animal Industry made surveys and they filed a report and the fact of the business is that livestock will not eat this bitterweed unless feed is scarce. Sheep and cows were killed by the thousands, it was proved, solely because the rangemen overstocked their range.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. This bitterweed does not kill cattle. That is a dairying country, and those farmers have been advised by the Department of Agriculture to diversify, and they are diversifying. That is a wonderful dairying country, yet this bitterweed grows up at a certain season of the year and ruins the milk and the butter so that the people not only cannot sell it, but cannot use it, and it is costing millions of dollars a year. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I insist upon my amendment. It is a matter for the Agricultural Department, the land-grant colleges, and the experimental stations in every State. We appropriate millions of dollars for that purpose, and why build up a duplicate agency under the Tennessee Valley Authority, none of whom are experts on noxious weeds? [Applause.]

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment. I had no idea that there would be any attempt made to strike out that portion of the bill which is sought to be stricken out by the amendment of our colleague, Mr. BUCHANAN. I may say to you that the matter of weeds and the extermination of weeds is a matter of great concern to the section of the country which I represent, the State of Nebraska. We have had a great deal of difficulty in our State with noxious weeds, especially the bindweed. We find that a certain chemical, sodium chlorate, is the only chemical which will successfully cope with those weeds. I may say that the matter of weeds is of such importance to the farmers of the State of Nebraska that when a piece of land is infested with these weeds it is impossible for the owner of the land to procure a loan from any governmental loan agencies or private loan agencies.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. I wish to ask the gentleman if in his State the farmers are bothered with hog cholera or chicken cholera or distemper in horses or anything like that, and if he thinks an amendment to that effect would give the Tennessee Valley Authority the right to go over there and help with those diseases?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is not before us. I am speaking about a matter that is before us. I am speaking of the matter of permitting the Tennessee Valley Authority to establish a clinic, you might say, for the use or development of a chemical which will eradicate this bindweed pest in the middle western sections of the country. If you are going to spend money to generate cheap electricity for those people living in the vicinity of the Tennessee Valley and also spend money for experimenting in the raising of cattle and poultry, as has been stated here on the floor of the House, then I see no valid reason for supporting this amendment which would have the effect of prohibiting experimentation in the production of a chemical, as provided by the bill, to eradicate weed pests which are so destructive of farm lands in the Middle West.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. In just a moment. The cost of the chemical which is the only salvation for the farmers of our section of the country, at the present time, is so great that it is practically impossible for the farmers to purchase it, and their land is going to ruin because of the tremendous spread of those weeds. They can be destroyed by the very chemical which can be developed cheaply in the Tennessee Valley if this amendment is not agreed to.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. As a matter of fact, the Tennessee Valley Authority as administered covers about everything, and there is not any reason why it should not cover the destruction of weeds, hog cholera, and everything else. If this is to be an experimental field, a laboratory to experiment for the betterment of mankind, and weeds are injurious to crops throughout the country, why should we not experiment on weeds down there?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I am speaking about the development of this chemical.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman from Nebraska is one of the outstanding members of this body. He is always looking out for his constituents and I do not blame him for wanting to include in this bill something for Nebraska. His logic is usually sound and his reasoning is always convincing.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. This is one chemical that can be used successfully to eradicate this weed pest, and it can be manufactured cheaply in the Muscle Shoals factory.

Mr. MICHENER. But they have not yet determined that they can manufacture this chemical.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is the thing which we are asking shall be developed, under this law.

Mr. MICHENER. In other words, you want them to experiment to see whether they can develop a chemical that will satisfactorily kill this weed?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. The gentleman is a little facetious, of course, but I am pleading for the farmers of the Middle West, whose land is being destroyed and who are seeking relief. I say to you if you were a farmer and went out into a field and saw acre after acre laid waste by these weeds you would not take kindly to facetious remarks on the part of Members of Congress.

I ask that this amendment be voted down. [Applause.]

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I yield.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it not a fact that the bindweed in Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma is worse this year than it ever has been, and the Department of Agriculture has not done a thing about it?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I can say that a meeting of people interested in this matter was called in Washington and dozens of representatives from all sections of the country came to Washington at their own expense, representatives of agricultural colleges, representatives of farm organizations, and representatives of those who are in distress, seeking this relief, and this is the very thing which they want. They want to develop this chemical at a cheap cost, so that it can be used to protect their lands against the ravages of the destructive bind weed. It is impossible now on account of the expense.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] has expired.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I desire to call to the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], Chairman of the Committee on Appriations, to his letter in connection with this matter to the Committee on Military Affairs, while this bill was under consideration, in which letter he says:

> As this subject matter was recently in conference between the two Houses on the agricultural appropriation bill and settled, as I thought, very sensibly and satisfactorily by making available for this very purpose a total of $65,000, a part of which was to be expended in cooperation or consultation with the Tennessee Valley Authority. I would appreciate the opportunity of discussing the matter with you before action is taken by you on your bill.

I thought the gentleman had overlooked the fact that the Agriculture Department appropriation bill makes an appropriation of $65,000 for this very purpose.

Mr. BUCHANAN. It certainly does.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This proposal certainly is a duplication of Government effort and of expense and ought to be stopped.

I want to recommend to the gentleman from Nebraska and to his farmers out there that they do like some of our stockmen have done down in the State of Texas. When this bitterweed developed on a certain ranch in Shackelford County, owned by J. A. Matthews, of Albany, Tex., he appealed to the Department of Agriculture to determine for him and his neighbors the particular weed that was poisoning and killing their livestock. They sent an expert down there and definitely designated the bitter weed that was doing the injury. That stockman wisely employed a bunch of helpers and got out there and did not stop until he had destroyed every poisonous weed of that variety on his ranch.

It just takes a little effort, a little work, a little perseverance, a little energy to accomplish these things. He did not ask the Government to destroy the weeds. He destroyed them.

People ought to quit calling on the Government of the United States for everything that they can do for themselves. [Applause.] This duplication of Government effort and expense ought to stop. There ought to be a limit to it somewhere.

The responsibility of this Congress, so far as the House of Representatives is concerned, for protecting the Treasury, rests largely upon the shoulders of my distinguished colleague the Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. BUCHANAN]. He is responsible for the money that comes out of the Treasury. He is responsible, in a way, to the taxpayers of this Nation as to whether their money is going to be spent injudiciously and wastefully, and to protect the people he has offered an amendment that ought to be adopted.

Take KLEBERG's country. If there should be any menace arising from bitterweed they would not call on the Government of the United States to destroy the weeds, they would put their hands out there and do the destroying themselves; and that is what ought to be done in Nebraska. They ought to use a little personal effort out there, they ought to get out there and destroy this bitterweed by the use of a little energy, efficiency, and perseverance.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I think the gentleman from Texas should realize that the use of this chemical does not mean that the farmers will not work, but that they will accomplish the work more quickly and efficiently with this chemical. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. The trouble with that is that they are depending too much on Washington. They ought not to have their eyes on Washington; they ought to do like the gentleman and I did when we were boys—depend on ourselves and not on Washington for everything we needed. [Applause.]

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do close in 3 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an explantation in regard to the bindweed which, in the Western States, has become a calamity. Cultivation will not kill it. The only thing that will kill it is a sodium chlorate which can be manufactured only at such plants as Muscle Shoals. We have made a study of the sources of this chemical. To import this chemical from Europe would cost the farmers of this country about 9 cents a pound. In Scandinavia, where they have plants similar to Muscle Shoals, this chemical is manufactured for 1½ cents a pound. If our farmers could buy this chemical for 1½ cents a pound, such as they could were it manufactured at a plant like Muscle Shoals, manufactured as a byproduct, it would not only help liquidate the cost of the investment at the plant but it would also help all the central section of the country, the Middle West, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Minnesota, Wisconsin, and the Dakotas to destroy this weed at a very small cost.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCKEY. I yield.

Mr. BUCHANAN. As a matter of fact, the deficiency bill carries an appropriation for the Agricultural Department and authorization to them to make an allotment to the Tennessee Valley Authority for the purpose of experimenting with the manufacture of this chemical. So everything is fixed to permit the Tennessee Valley Authority to make this experiment with money already appropriated.

Mr. LUCKEY. May I say in reply to the gentleman from Texas that we have corresponded with the Tennessee Valley Authority, and they stated they did not feel that the manufacturers of sodium chlorate, as such, by the Corporation was not permissible under the present act, and that they could not do so unless they were specifically authorized to manufacture the chemical.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCKEY. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman state what reason or logic there is to hitch onto a bill regulating commerce and national defense pet hobbies with reference to weeds, chickens, hogs, cows, corn borers, and everything else?

Mr. LUCKEY. This is not a pet hobby. This chemical can be manufactured by the Tennessee Valley Authority without additional expense, manufactured as a byproduct the sale of which will help bear the cost of the project.

Mr. McSWAIN. Does the gentleman expect us to go out there and put it on the weeds?

Mr. LUCKEY. No; all we are asking for is a cheap source of supply at a cent and a half or two cents a pound, such as they have over in Europe.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DONDERO) there were—ayes 111, noes 73.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN, Mr. WOOD, and Mr. CARPENTER demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. McLAUGHLIN and Mr. BUCHANAN to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported there were—yeas 173, noes 75.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 9 of said act, as follows:

"SEC. 9. (a) The Board is hereby directed in the operation of any dam or reservoir in its possession and control to regulate the stream flow primarily for the purposes of promoting navigation and controlling floods. So far as may be consistent with such purposes, the Board is authorized to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy at any such dam for the use of the Corporation and for the use of the United States or any agency thereof, and the Board is further authorized, whenever an opportunity is afforded, to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy in order to avoid the waste of water power, to transmit and market such power as in this act provided, and thereby, so far as may be practicable, to assist in liquidating the cost or aid in the maintenance of the projects of the Authority."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DRIVER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933, and had come to no resolution thereon.

EDWARD T. TAYLOR

The SPEAKER. Several days ago the Chair received a letter from the majority leader, the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. BANKHEAD, which he asked be laid before the Members of the House. Without objection, the Chair will ask the Clerk to read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

JASPER, ALA., June 25, 1935.

HON. JOSEPH W. BYRNS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have just read in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the remarks made in the House by many Members, upon the seventy-seventh birthday of Hon. EDWARD T. TAYLOR, our able and distinguished acting majority leader. It is a matter of keen personal regret that I was not present to hear the just and most deserved praise bestowed upon my beloved friend upon that occasion. I wish with all my heart that I could have had the privilege of joining my colleagues in a tribute of appraisal as well as of affection for this distinguished son of Colorado.

I have served with him in Congress for nearly 20 years, and I know the man. I know his mind; I know his heart; I know his fine probity of thought and action; his sense of balance and proportion, his high qualities of justice and patriotism. This knowledge prompted me to request that he act in my place as majority leader during my unfortunate illness. I am grateful to him beyond measure for bearing my burdens during this session of Congress.

I am assured that these added responsibilities have served to enhance the respect and affection in which he is held by all Members of the House. I extend my belated congratulations to EDWARD TAYLOR upon his birthday and to the country for his long, consecrated, and invaluable services.

With sincere personal regards.

Sincerely your friend,

WILLIAM B. BANKHEAD.

PRIVILEGES OF THE HOUSE

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have a matter of correcting a false report that should require not more than a few minutes. For the purpose of getting it immediately before the House, I rise to a question of the privileges of the House and present a privileged resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas all over the United States the press has erroneously asserted that in a brusque, uncalled-for manner the Doorkeeper of the House of Representatives forced a mother and child to leave the House gallery because she was nursing her baby, and inferentially censuring the House of Representatives for not allowing a mother to nurse her baby in the House gallery; and

Whereas such erroneous assertion and report are shown to be untrue and wholly without foundation by the following statement from the Doorkeeper of the House, to wit:

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 9, 1935.

Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Replying to your inquiry concerning the incident of a woman nursing her child in the House gallery, I submit herewith an accurate statement of the affair.

On the morning of June 27 at 11 o'clock as the Chaplain began to offer the prayer, my attention was attracted to the gallery. I saw a man and woman with several children sitting in the front row of the north gallery almost opposite the Speaker's rostrum, and the woman was nursing a baby in her arms. About 10 minutes later I again heard the noise of the child, and the mother continued to nurse the baby. It was quite evident that the only way the mother could keep the baby quiet was by nursing, because within the next three-quarters of the hour she had to nurse the child several times more.

As the mother was looking distressed because the baby continued to be restless and noisy and was attracting the attention of many persons, I made a kindly suggestion to the husband that if his wife wished to nurse the baby again there was a ladies' rest room nearby where she could go and be comfortable. I thought only of being of service to the distressed mother. The husband said, 'We will go out', and I patted him on the shoulder several times and assured him that they could stay in the gallery as long as they wished to do so. I did not request the woman to leave. I did not even speak to her, as she was sitting three seats away from her husband. I did try to be of some assistance to her.

Mothers have nursed babies in the gallery before this incident and they have never been interfered with. They are welcome at all times.

Respectfully yours,

J. J. SINNOTT,
Doorkeeper House of Representatives.

And whereas the erroneous report published in every portion of the United States to the effect that the House of Representatives was inconsiderate and cruel enough to force an American mother out of its gallery simply because she saw fit to nurse her baby in arms, is a reflection upon the House of Representatives, and affects its safety and dignity and the integrity of its proceedings, the facts being that during its entire history no American mother as a visitor to the House gallery has ever been shown anything but the very highest respect and consideration for her comfort and convenience: Therefore be it

Resolved, That said report emanating from Washington and published generally in the United States was incorrect and without warrant.

Mr. RANKIN (interrupting the reading of the resolution). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that enough of the resolution has been read to show that it is not privileged.

Mr. BLANTON. It should be privileged when the House of Representatives has been charged with having shown disrespect and an inexcusable indignity to an American mother.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, it does not reflect on the dignity of the proceedings of the House at all.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will finish the reading of the resolution. The Chair cannot pass on the matter until the reading of the resolution has been concluded, and since the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] insists that the resolution is privileged it should be read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the resolution.

Mr. MICHENER (interrupting the reading of the resolution). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the resolution has been read far enough to convince anyone that it is not privileged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I submit that the resolution will show, when read in its entirety, that it is privileged, as the House of Representatives has been falsely charged with having shown discourtesy, disrespect, and indignity to a deserving American mother.

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests that the gentleman from Texas ask unanimous consent that the resolution be read. The Chair does not think the resolution is privileged.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this erroneous statement has gone into every newspaper in the United States and has placed the House of Representatives in a false light before the country.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that the gentleman from Texas will have the slightest difficulty if he will ask unanimous consent for the reading of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may finish the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the resolution is privileged.

Without objection, the Clerk will complete the reading of the resolution.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, since I have permission to extend my remarks, I want to show why I deemed it necessary to correct this false report. Criticism after criticism of Congress have appeared in the press of Washington and the 48 States, denouncing the House of Representatives for ejecting from its gallery a worthy American mother, when no mother was ejected, and when in fact no mother was molested in any way, and when every mother in the United States has an inherent right to visit the gallery of the House of Representatives at will, and to nurse her baby there whenever she sees fit.

It is no disgrace for an American mother to nurse her baby in the gallery of the House of Representatives. Nursing her baby there, whenever she sees fit to do so, does not in any way disturb the dignity of the House of Representatives. Many mothers are unable financially to hire nurses to care for their babies. Some of the greatest men and women of the United States have been raised by such mothers. If a mother were not allowed to bring her baby with her, many mothers would be denied the privilege of visiting their Capitol and of visiting their House of Representatives, and for 150 years they have been welcome in its gallery.

To show the necessity for correcting this erroneous report, there appears on page 11 of this afternoon's Washington Times, July 8, 1935, the following letter:

FEEDING BABY NOT UNDIGNIFIED

To the EDITOR OF THE TIMES:

Congress should be ashamed of itself to allow any mother with a hungry baby to be ordered out of the Capitol because she fed it. I don't see that she did anything very undignified. The baby was hungry and had to be fed.

If Mrs. Parker had been the daughter or wife of a Senator, the Members of Congress would not have crushed her heart, as they did by ordering her out of the Capitol.

All the Senators had mothers. I wonder how they would feel to have their mothers or wives put out of a public place.

Mrs. Parker's child is as dear to her as a king's child is to him. I believe that the whole city has been disgraced by the action of Congress.

M. D.

Mr. Speaker, it would have been a disgrace to Washington and a disgrace to the House of Representatives if it had ejected an American mother from its gallery for nursing her baby, and it is a disgrace to the House of Representatives to allow a false report to that effect to be broadcasted all over the United States without being corrected. Such a false report does affect the integrity of this House. Such a false report does affect the dignity of its proceedings.

I cannot believe there is any Member of this House who is indifferent to the natural effect of such a false charge on the public mind. I cannot believe that there is any Member of this House who would be willing for such a false report to go unchallenged. I feel that I am protecting the good name of this House of Representatives by procuring this statement from our Doorkeeper, Hon. Joseph J. Sinnot, showing that there is no truth in this erroneous report.

It is my firm belief that to every right-thinking American, a mother nursing her baby at her breast typifies the highest, the finest, the noblest instincts there are in Nature. One great cause for the crumbling of our civilization is the failure of many children to receive the personal care of their mothers and the good training that only mothers can give their young children through personal care and constant companionship.

As one Member of this House of Representatives, I want it to go out to the mothers of America that they are welcome guests in the gallery of the House of Representatives. If to visit there it is necessary for them to nurse their baby, they have the God-given inherent right to do so, and they will suffer no indignity from anyone. The Capitol of the United States is their Capitol. The Representatives in the Congress of the United States are their Representatives, here to serve them, and to protect them in every right and privilege. They will receive only courteous and respectful treatment from the officers and employees of the House of Representatives.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution just read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have from now until the close of the session on Friday, July 12, in which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD upon the pending bill (H. R. 8632).

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, that will only give the Members 1 day following the consideration of the bill. If we are going to grant permission to the Members to extend their remarks, we ought to give them 5 days and I ask unanimous consent that the Members may have 5 legislative days after the conclusion of the consideration of the bill within which to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is agreeable to me.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina, as amended, that all Members may have 5 legislative days following the consideration of the pending bill within which to extend their own remarks in the RECORD?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow morning, after the reading of the Journal, I may address the House for 5 minutes about the farmer's wife being driven out of the gallery of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. HOBBS. I object, Mr. Speaker.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that business in order on tomorrow, Calendar Wednesday, be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. KIMBALL (at the request of Mr. MAPES), indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 39 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Wednesday, July 10, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

9114. Also, petition of the Buckeye Club, by its president, Frank J. Klady, Lorain, Ohio, favoring all legislation so amending our immigration laws that it may be provided that all aliens who have not and who in the future will not at the earliest time permissible by law make application for citizenship and similarly pursue such efforts shall on such failure or on rejection become immediately deportable; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

9115. Also, petition of the National Association of Letter Carriers, Branch No. 100, by their secretary, V. M. Hoeffel, urging support of House bills 5450, 6124, 6368, and 6672, which support a graduated tax on cigarettes; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9116. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Board of Commissioners of the City of San Juan, P. R.; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Tuesday, July 9, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2966) to empower the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize the issuance of revenue bonds, to authorize the city and county of Honolulu to issue flood-control bonds, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 8270) to enable the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize the issuance of certain bonds, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. ROBINSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Johnson	Pittman
Ashurst	Coolidge	Keyes	Pope
Austin	Copeland	King	Radcliffe

Mr. VANDENBERG. I again announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is absent because of illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] is absent because of a death in his family, and that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are detained from the Senate on important public business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, OFFICE OF EDUCATION, INTERIOR DEPARTMENT (S. DOC. NO. 112)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior, fiscal year 1936, for further endowment of colleges of agriculture and the mechanic arts, Office of Education, amounting to $980,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, BUILDINGS AND EQUIPMENT, PENAL INSTITUTIONS (S. DOC. NO. 113)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Justice—buildings and equipment, penal institutions—to remain available until expended, amounting to $4,500,000, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SUPPLEMENTAL ESTIMATE, LEGISLATIVE ESTABLISHMENT (S. DOC. NO. 114)

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the legislative establishment—contingent expenses, Senate, expenses of inquiries and investigations—fiscal year 1936, in the sum of $150,000, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

SERVICE RENDERED BY T. V. A. TO ATHENS, ALA.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a resolution adopted by the mayor and city council of the city of Athens, Ala.

I do this at the request of the mayor of Athens. In a letter to me he states that they have found it necessary to adopt this resolution on account of an article which appeared in the Red Book Magazine for August. The citizens of Athens believe that an erroneous reference has been made to the city of Athens and its connection with the Tennessee Valley Authority. They are of the impression that the article left the idea that the people of Athens are not satisfied with the service received by them from the Tennessee Valley Authority. On the contrary, they are fully satisfied. It has been of immense benefit to them.

I therefore ask that the resolution may be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

Whereas the people of the city of Athens, Ala., have been greatly benefited by the contract of the city of Athens with Tennessee Valley Authority for furnishing electricity to the city of Athens; and

Whereas the people of the city and the city government appreciate the generous provision thereby made for their comfort and happiness; and

Whereas in an article in the last issue of the Red Book Magazine a letter was quoted purporting to have been written by a chief official of some city in Alabama under contract with Tennessee Valley Authority for electricity in the city; and

Whereas the import of this quotation was that the city implied was not benefited by its contract; and

Whereas this is by no means true of the situation in Athens, and the letter might be taken to refer to the city of Athens: Therefore be it

AMERICAN IDEALS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BYRD

Mr. VAN NUYS. Mr. President, on July 4, here in the city of Washington, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] delivered a very eloquent and persuasive address on the subject of "American Ideals." In the course of the address he said:

> Many men believe that this Constitution made possible and promoted and preserved most of the prosperity and happiness that has come, under the kind providence of God, to the American people. And the reasons for this belief are plain to those of us, like myself, who are not lawyers, and who are not concerned by the technicalities of the law. The Constitution, together with the Bill of Rights, protects those rights which Thomas Jefferson called inalienable, and the enjoyment of which is necessary to our pride and self-respect, as well as to our happiness and prosperity.

Further on he said:

> And so there must be some agency of the Government to decide between the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the States. The wise founders created the Supreme Court; and John Marshall, as Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, with irresistible logic, asserted the power of the courts to determine and declare when an act of Congress was contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. If such power did not reside in the courts there would be no effective protection afforded to the rights of minorities which the Constitution was intended to protect, and in fact there would be no Constitution.

I commend this address to my colleagues and to the citizenship of our country in general. I ask that the entire address of Senator HARRY F. BYRD, of Virginia, delivered at Washington's Fourth of July celebration, 1935, Monument Grounds, over Nation-wide network, be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN IDEALS

Fifty years ago a Senator from the State of Virginia, the eloquent John W. Daniel, pronounced the words that dedicated this monument to the memory of George Washington. This was an honor to Virginia that is repeated today when I am permitted again to express her veneration for the greatest of Americans.

However incapable I may be of justifying my selection as speaker, I appreciate the compliment paid Virginia through me, because Washington was born and cradled, lived and died within the borders of the Old Dominion. He represented my county of Frederick in the Virginia House of Burgesses. He loved Virginia, but he lived to become the Father of a Nation formed of all the States, and declared that "the name of America must always exalt the just pride of patriotism." "Washington," says Guizot, the historian, "did the two greatest things which in politics it is permitted man to attempt. He maintained by peace the independence which he had conquered by war. He founded a free government in the name of the principles of order and by reestablishing their sway."

It is a long time since Guizot made this striking declaration; many Americans have achieved greatness by service to country since our first President was entombed on the banks of the Potomac, but Washington remains today, in the words of Henry Lee, "First in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen." Not only was Washington a great man; he was a good man; he was great in achievements and he was also noble in character.

There have, indeed, been those who sought to dim the glory of his name in history, as there were those who traduced him even while he fought to achieve our independence and to cement the Colonies in national strength and security, but in the fiercest critical light that beats upon him his character shines as strong as the granite blocks that compose this monument and as pure as these four white walls that soar to kiss each rising sun in his memory.

Posterity has approved the declaration of Edward Everett that he was "the greatest of good men and the best of great men."

I was announced to speak on American ideals, and I am doing this in recalling the nobility of Washington, for he himself in his life and character is one of the greatest of American ideals. I cannot stand here at the foot of the shaft soaring to his memory in the city that is itself dedicated to his greatness and fail to make him the text of my talk.

Washington for his day was a conservative in thought and judgment. He was a man of sound sense. He had accumulated property, but he did not hesitate to imperil that property, to risk his life, and to incur the stigma of rebellion against his King when the King's government taxed the Colonies without representation and interfered with that degree of individual freedom that was the right of a free-born man. Washington was true to the blood that flowed in his veins from the mother country—true to Anglo-Saxon traditions—when he respected the necessary authority of government, but refused to submit to the misuse of such authority.

In a long war his brave spirit, no less than his accomplished sword, triumphed over enemies without and the faint hearted within our borders; but scarcely had our independence been achieved when the individual Colonies, jealous of their separate rights and interests, refused to unite effectively and drifted toward chaos in the loose bonds of the confederation. Again the prestige and power of example of Washington were drafted by his countrymen in support of a Constitution under which the Colonies could form a more perfect union. Others, indeed, drew the provisions at Philadelphia that formed our fundamental law, but without the support of Washington it is doubtful if a sufficient number of States would have ratified the Constitution to make it effective.

Washington believed that the choice was between the Constitution and utter confusion and although silent as he was as a speaker, his great figure and known opinion stood a tower of strength to guide and support those who battled in debate to lay firm the foundations of an effective union.

Many men believe that this Constitution made possible and promoted and preserved most of the prosperity and happiness that has come, under the kind providence of God, to the American people. And the reasons for this belief are plain to those of us, like myself, who are not lawyers and who are not concerned by the technicalities of the law. The Constitution, together with the Bill of Rights, protects those rights which Thomas Jefferson called inalienable, and the enjoyment of which is necessary to our pride and self-respect, as well as to our happiness and prosperity.

In simple language one may say that the Constitution protects your individual freedom and your individual property and your right to have home tribunals pass upon those matters which most intimately affect you.

The founders of our Republic had learned from history and experience that the rights of the individual are more securely safeguarded if the laws which govern us are made and administered so far as possible by home legislatures and courts. Then, too, in a country so vast and diversified as this, a central Government may not understand and effectively meet all the local problems peculiar to the several sections and whose needs vary greatly one from the other.

Men of equally good intentions cannot always agree upon the proper boundaries of the rights of the States; cannot take a map and mark where the jurisdiction of the Federal Government begins and the jurisdiction of the State government ends. Yet remember that the Constitution provides that the Government has only the powers granted it by the States and that all powers not granted are reserved to the States or the people thereof.

And so there must be some agency of the Government to decide between the jurisdiction of the Federal Government and the States. The wise founders created the Supreme Court, and John Marshall, as Chief Justice, speaking for the Court, with irresistible logic asserted the power of the courts to determine and declare when an act of Congress was contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. If such power did not reside in the courts there would be no effective protection afforded to the rights of minorities which the Constitution was intended to protect, and in fact there would be no Constitution.

In that great document is the heart of the liberty of the individual American, and it is the function of the Supreme Court to protect it.

In a notable address made at Richmond, Va., on the occasion of the unveiling of a marble bust of another great Virginian, James Madison, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Charles Evans Hughes, said in a striking sentence, "Success in solving our problems lies in a wise application of Madison's controlling principle of the maintenance of a strong National Government, together with the essential authority of the States over their local affairs and with constant respect for those individual rights which experience and conscience teach us should be inviolable."

The framers of the Constitution provided wisely a method to amend and change it to meet changing conditions. The Constitution is not sacred—it may be changed—but the fundamental principles sought to be protected by the Constitution are sacred and vital to the life, liberty, and chance of happiness of every American. No one can deny the great difficulty of solving the economic problems that confront our great Nation today. And here at this monument to the man who made possible the constitutional liberty that has made our country great may we hope that the spirit of Washington will give us strength, wisdom, and vision to provide a solution for our present difficulties, and let us pledge ourselves to continue in loyalty and devotion to the faith of Washington that made and will keep us free.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF TODAY

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, on July Fourth, through the press of the Nation and over the air to an estimated radio audience of 15,000,000, a very unusual, timely, and significant document, The Declaration of Independence of Today, was promulgated by the United States Flag Association, a great patriotic society which has the distinction of having been headed, as honorary presidents general, by three Presidents of the United States—Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover, and Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The Declaration of Independence of Today is signed by 56 loyal, law-abiding citizens of the Republic—men and women outstanding in their respective spheres of endeavor, whose names command respect and inspire confidence wherever known. They typify the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence of 1776, which the Declaration of Independence of Today paraphrases in a clever and ingenious way. Twenty-seven of the signers are the national heads of well-known patriotic, civic, fraternal, and other organizations, with a total membership of 13,000,000.

Not only do I wish to congratulate the United States Flag Association on the originality of the conception and promulgation of the Declaration of Independence of Today but I wish also to take advantage of this opportunity to felicitate the association on the splendid and effective work it has been doing during the last 3 years in fighting crime.

Under the fearless, intelligent, and indefatigable leadership of its president general, Col. James A. Moss, United States Army, retired, who for 11 years has devoted his time and energies to the affairs of the United States Flag Association without salary, the organization has done most effective and far-reaching work in creating and galvanizing into action public sentiment for law enforcement. The association's national anticrime conference, held in Washington in 1933, the first of its kind in the history of the Nation, was the forerunner of the splendid national anticrime conference held under the auspices of the United States Department of Justice in 1934.

Mr. President, the Declaration of Independence of Today is such a timely and significant document, and I feel so sure voices the sentiments of practically all, if not all, the Members of this august body, several of whom have signed it, that I would like to read it for the benefit of those who did not hear it read over the radio by Assistant Secretary of War Harry H. Woodring.

It is as follows:

IN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
July 4th, 1935.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE OF TODAY
BEING A DECLARATION OF FREEDOM FROM CRIME AND COMMUNISM

When in the course of human events subversive and other forces assume proportions that make them a menace to the ideals and institutions of a nation and the happiness of its people, national loyalty and self-preservation demand that all patriotic citizens rally around the flag, waging on such forces relentless war.

We hold these statements to be true:

That under the system of government based on the ideals and institutions embodied in the Declaration of Independence and the Federal Constitution, the United States of America, whose people are normally the most prosperous and happiest on this planet, has in the short span of a century and a half become a Nation in power and in wealth, in influence, and in character second to none on earth.

That the wages of the American workman are the highest in the world and that the standard of living in this country is far above that of any other, the masses normally enjoying comforts and conveniences of life unknown to even the well-to-do of other lands.

That this great Republic and the blessings of life we are enjoying under its flag have been secured at a tremendous cost of blood and treasure, trial and toil, suffering and sacrifice on the part of our forefathers and others before us.

That the great majority of the American people are loyal and law-abiding, being opposed to communism and other anti-American forces and condemning crime and racketeering.

All experience has shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable than to rise and destroy them. But when a long train of occurrences has brought about conditions that threaten the existence of a government and the safety and happiness of its people, preservation from tribulation and misfortune, from suffering and destruction, requires that the evils be annihilated.

The American people have been most patient in their sufferance of the activities of Communists whose subversive doings have been a menace to our institutions, and of criminals and racketeers whose records are recitals of disgrace, expense, intimidation, and terrorism.

To prove this let the facts be submitted.

Every year several thousand citizens are murdered and many thousands kidnaped, robbed, and assaulted, while thousands of homes and other places are burglarized, or burned by incendiaries at a loss of millions of dollars.

More than a hundred thousand crimson-handed assassins are today roaming at large, and a half a million men and women, constituting the scarlet army of the United States, are making their living through crime.

With larger ones being constantly built, our jails and penitentiaries are filled to overflowing with felons and other violators of the law.

America's annual crime bill amounts to billions while the people are each year paying the racketeers billions more.

Because of this stupendous crime bill the American people are paying higher Federal, State, and municipal taxes, and on account of racketeering we are paying higher prices for the clothes we wear, the food we eat, and other commodities of life we use.

As a result of the large number of arsons, burglaries, and robberies, we are paying higher fire, burglary and theft insurance rates.

Thus do crime and racketeering reach every home and affect every man, woman, and child in the United States.

With crime challenging American civilization and threatening American institutions, so terrible and disgraceful have conditions become that America, our country, is today stigmatized in the eyes of mankind as the most lawless country in the world, in which life, body, and property are less secure than in any other civilized land.

The Communists and other radical forces are spending $6,000,000 a year in propaganda and other ways to undermine and finally destroy the Republic.

Many Communist aliens who are in this country illegally are agitating and plotting for the overthrow of the Government.

In addition to a number of Communist daily newspapers, there are scores of weekly and semiweekly papers, with many monthlies and semimonthlies and hundreds of shop and other publications.

For the teaching of communism a dozen schools, with several thousand students, have been established in various parts of the country.

Communistic indoctrination is taking place in our schools and colleges to an extent undreamed of a few years ago.

Communists are making systematic and continued efforts to sow the seeds of communism among the naval and military forces of the Nation.

Annually a number of Communist summer camps, where the red flag is hoisted daily, are conducted in different sections of the United States and attended by thousands of boys and girls who are taught hatred of God, hatred of the American Government, and hatred of the American flag.

The time is come when every man must declare himself and show his colors, be they red or pink, black or blue, brown or silver, or be they the red, white, and blue. You are either for or against America and Americanism. There can be no compromise. Those who are contented with America and Americanism and who are law-abiding must separate themselves from those who are discontented with our system of government and from those who are violators of the law.

Loyal and law-abiding Americans, let us rise and, joining hands in the great brotherhood of Americanism, with militancy in our hearts and determination in our souls, with vigor in our spirits and strength in our arms, wage relentless war on our country's enemies!

As the patriots of '76, the Americans of yesterday, freed themselves from the oppression and abuses of King George III of Great Britain, let us Americans of today free ourselves from the terrorism and burden of King Crime of America, from the intimidation and extortion of racketeers, and from the propaganda and menace of Communists.

Let us band together in a great, aggressive, invincible army of defenders of the flag—the flag which is the only bond we have that unites every American to every other regardless of religious creed, racial blood, social standing, or other position in life.

Thus united, with the battle cry, "Crime and communism must perish", neither asking nor giving quarter, let us declare war—relentless, incessant war—on these our country's foes.

And in support of this declaration, with full confidence in American ideals and institutions, and with abiding faith in the destiny of the Nation, we mutually pledge to each other our loyal support, our whole-hearted cooperation, and our unceasing efforts.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD an article from the Washington Evening Star of Thursday, July 4, 1935; an extract from an article written by Mr. Brisbane and published in the Washington Herald; and also a radio address delivered by Hon. Patrick J. Hurley, former Secretary of War, as a part of the United States Flag Association program of July 4. The articles and the address by Mr. Hurley relate to the same subject matter which I have just referred to.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Star of July 4, 1935]

CRIME AND REDS HIT BY SPEAKERS—HURLEY, WOODRING, AND MOSS ATTACK COMMUNISM IN JULY 4 BROADCAST

Characterizing crime and communism as two of the most dangerous forces confronting the Nation today, former Secretary of War Patrick J. Hurley and Assistant Secretary of War Harry H. Woodring in a dramatic Fourth of July radio broadcast today called on the American people to unite in combating these forces and to promote through education in churches, schools, and organized groups a broader understanding and higher regard for the ideals and principles set forth by the patriots of 1776 who signed the Declaration of Independence.

With Col. James A. Moss, president general of the United States Flag Association, presiding, the program was broadcast from Washington over the facilities of the National Broadcasting Co. under the auspices of the flag association, which is headed by President Roosevelt as honorary president general, with Chief Justice of the United States Charles E. Hughes as chairman of its board of founders. The association is conducting an intensive Nation-wide campaign of patriotic education in an effort to check the spread of crime, communistic teachings, and other un-American influences.

NEW DECLARATION READ

An outstanding feature of the broadcast was the promulgation of the Declaration of Independence of Today, a declaration of freedom from crime and communism, which has been prepared by the Flag Association and which will be read by Assistant Secretary of War Woodring. The document, which paraphrases the original Declaration of Independence, bears the signatures of 56 loyal, law-abiding Americans—men and women outstanding in their respective spheres of human endeavor, whose names wherever known command respect and inspire confidence. They typify the 56 signers of the original Declaration of Independence. Twenty-seven of them are national heads of well-known patriotic, civic, fraternal, and other organizations having a total membership of almost 13,000,000.

Preliminary to reading the Declaration of Independence of Today, Assistant Secretary of War Woodring said: "As I contemplate on this anniversary of the birth of the Nation the acts of abuse and tyranny of King George III of Great Britain, which are cited in the Declaration of Independence, and which constituted the causes of the Revolutionary War, I am impressed with their mildness as compared with the acts of terrorization and exploitation which the American people are today undergoing at the hands of criminals and racketeers.

"Also, as I see in the Declaration of Independence the patience with which our forefathers suffered abuse and tyranny, I think of the patience with which our people have for a long time endured the communistic propaganda that is being carried on in this country, which advocates the destruction of our American system of government by use of force and violence."

COLONEL MOSS MAKES APPEAL

Colonel Moss called on the patriotic, civic, and fraternal organizations of the country to unite in fighting crime and communism. He offered them the cooperation of the United States Flag Association. "The American people have it in their power", he said, "to annihilate crime and communism if they only make up their minds to do so. In every community of any size from Maine to Texas, from New York to California, in the form of patriotic, civic, fraternal, religious, and educational organizations and women's clubs there already exists the machinery necessary to fight successfully crime and communism. The potentialities of the cooperating or united action of these thousands of organizations now in existence in all parts of the country are tremendous beyond conception. The mobilization of their power and influence in the furtherance of Americanism would result in a force that would sweep everything before it. It is only necessary to adjust, oil, and coordinate this magnificent and stupendous machinery and then turn on the power. Crime and communism would be crushed.

"During the 3 years that the United States Flag Association has been making a study of crime and communism we have collected much data that would be most helpful to organizations which, alone or in cooperation with others, would like to fight these two menaces.

"This data we gladly place at the disposal of any and all local and national organizations wishing to combat crime and communism. Also, we will, upon request, gladly give permission to any organization, to use in fighting crime and communism or any other anti-Americanism, any of the text or illustrations in any of the several copyrighted books published by the United States Flag Association. Furthermore, we will gladly cooperate with them in any other way in our power by giving suggestions based on our experience or otherwise. Those organizations wishing our help or cooperation, please write to the United States Flag Association, Washington, D. C."

HURLEY STRESSES THEISM

Colonel Hurley stressed theism as implied in the Declaration of Independence as the basis of Americanism, and atheism as the essence of communism.

[Extract from an article by Arthur Brisbane, in the Washington Herald]

In Washington the United States Flag Association broadcasts a new "declaration of independence against crime and communism." The "declaration" holds these statements to be true:

"United States people are normally the most prosperous and happiest on the planet."

"Wages of the American workman are the highest in the world, and the American standard of living far above any other, the masses normally enjoying comforts and conveniences unknown even to the well-to-do of other lands."

These American blessings in America were acquired "at a tremendous cost in blood and treasure, trial and toil, suffering and sacrifice."

The new declaration goes on:

"Every year several thousand citizens are murdered, and many thousands kidnaped, robbed, and assaulted, * * * more than a hundred thousand crimson-handed assassins are today roaming at large, half a million men and women, constituting the scarlet army of the United States, make their living through crime."

Jails and penitentiaries are filling to overflowing, with newer, bigger jails constantly built. America's annual crime bill amounts to billions.

To make things worse, "Communists and radical forces are spending $6,000,000 a year in propaganda, to undermine and destroy the Republic." There are "Communist summer camps, where the red flag is hoisted daily."

The declaration calls upon every man to "show his colors, red, or pink, or black, or blue, brown, or silver, or the red, white, and blue."

All law-abiding Americans are urged to "rise and join hands in the great brotherhood of Americanism * * * wage relentless war on our country's enemies."

The declaration adopts for battle cry: "Crime and communism must perish." No definite plan is suggested.

Signatures on the new "declaration of independence" make it interesting; they include Theodore Roosevelt, II, son of the first President Roosevelt; Gene Tunney, retired heavyweight champion; former Governor Al Smith; A. P. Gianini, California banker; Admiral Byrd, who went far South; Arthur Capper, Senator from Kansas; Charles Curtis, formerly Vice President, and William Green, head of the American Federation of Labor.

Such names should make crime, racketeering, and communism tremble in their deepest lair.

REMARKS OF HON. PATRICK J. HURLEY, UNITED STATES FLAG ASSOCIATION PROGRAM, JULY 4, 1935

The United States Flag Association is a nonpartisan, nonprofit, patriotic organization. I congratulate the association on the aggressive leadership of its president general, Colonel Moss, who without salary has for 11 years faithfully, intelligently, and courageously directed its activities. The national anticrime conference held by the United States Flag Association in 1933 was the forerunner of that excellent anticrime conference conducted by the Department of Justice in 1934. The United States Flag Association is endeavoring to focus public attention upon the crime conditions existing in the country, and is helping to create and galvanize into action public sentiment for the enforcement of law and the defeat of communism in the United States.

AMERICANISM V. COMMUNISM

Today we celebrate the one hundred and fifty-ninth anniversary of the signing of the Declaration of Independence. By that document the people of the Colonies declared to the world their right to assume among the powers of the earth the "equal station to which the laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them." The Declaration also maintained "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, and among these are life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness." The signers closed the Declaration with this sentence: "And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of divine providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor." We have quoted these passages from the Declaration of Independence, which is the foundation of Americanism, to emphasize the fact that the basis of Americanism is theism—that is, a belief in the existence of God. The basis of communism is atheism, that is a denial of the existence of God. Belief in God has no sectarian limitations. It includes Protestants, Catholics, Jews, and all others who worship a supreme being.

We are continuously told that communism is merely a theory of economics—a panacea for humanity's present economic troubles. The fact is, however, that economics is only one of the elements of communism. Communism destroys personal liberty. It dictates and controls personal relations, political conduct, and all social relations, including marriage, education, and religion. The people under communism have no choice but to accept the edicts of their dictators. Communists assume that a dictator, or a small group, can think better for the people than they can think for themselves.

The system of laws by which the American people govern themselves, the spiritual, social, and economic objectives to which they aspire, constitute Americanism. Americanism is predicated on liberty with the sovereign power vested in all of the people. Communism and every form of collectivism is predicated on absolute power vested in an individual or a small group. The fundamental purpose of all government should be to assist the people in achieving their national objectives. The objectives of that system of government and economics which we call "Americanism" is to administer justice; to maintain liberty and equality of opportunity; to promote education; to eliminate poverty, intolerance, and crime; to provide a sound economic basis for the equitable distribution of production; to protect everyone in the pursuit of cultural and spiritual, as well as material happiness; and to guarantee to every citizen the enjoyment of the rights of man enumerated in the Constitution of the United States. The golden rule is the true foundation of Americanism. The American system has not achieved its ideals, but notwithstanding our present serious difficulties, it has more nearly approached its ideals than has any other nation at any time.

Liberty, of course, must have limitations which should be imposed and enforced by the people themselves. The limitations on liberty are as sacred as liberty itself. It takes an intelligent citizenship to maintain liberty. The lower the degree of intelligence, the more readily the population submits to communism and dictatorship.

We condemn all those among us who have made a license out of liberty, who have been guilty of the twin evils of stupidity and greed. We contend, however, that the overwhelming majority of the American people are honest and are worthy of self-government and that the dishonest minority can be punished and controlled without having to put the honest majority into the straight-jacket of communism and absolutism.

The people of this Nation cannot expect to remain free if they cease to be vigilant. In a democracy good government cannot exist where a majority of the citizens fail to discharge the duties of citizenship. Militant, intelligent citizens can compel the enforcement of all laws. If the laws now in existence were enforced every racketeer in business and in crime could be stopped at the beginning of his career.

Freedom of speech and press are guaranteed by the Constitution. This gives everyone and all the people a right to advocate any form of government and any system of economics they desire, whether it be Americanism, communism, fascism, socialism, or any other "ism." We may disagree with everything—with every word these absolutists and communists say, but as good Americans we must defend their right to say it. The communists have taken advantage of this freedom to advocate the overthrow of our Government by violence. That, of course, is sedition.

Shall we, as Americans, quietly surrender our liberties and our right to self-government and submit to the rule of a collectivist dictator, or do we still possess the intelligence and courage to govern ourselves? The time has come for every American who still believes in liberty and in God to meet both crime and communism in the open and overcome them.

JANESVILLE, WIS., CENTENNIAL CELEBRATION

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, yesterday I obtained unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address which has received considerable attention from Members of the Senate, and upon which they have commented favorably. I did so, thinking that it would not exceed 2 pages of the RECORD. I find that it considerably exceeds that amount of space.

I now have an estimate from the Public Printer according to the rule; and at this time I again ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very interesting and unusual address delivered by Mr. Stephen Bolles on July 2 last at the opening of the Janesville, Wis., centennial celebration.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Janesville (Wis.) Daily Gazette of July 3, 1935]

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I would be entirely lacking in a decent respect for the tremendous importance of this occasion, the opening ceremonies of a celebration which, however much may be said or however much may be done, would and will be wholly inadequate to tell the story or recall the past, were I not to acknowledge here that no honor could be conferred upon me by suffrages of the State or my own neighbors equal to this you have done to me.

What we say here today, what we do here today and this week will live long after the poor bodies of the participants have been laid away in the tomb. They may forget the singer, but we hope that they shall not forget the song. Though they may forget the artist we hope they will not forget the painting—that it will live upon walls of memory for that eternity which may come to the land in which we live this day.

History is not a mere listing of chronological events as they passed in years, one after another. It is not the story of wars and intrigue and blood and disaster, of empire living one day and dying tomorrow. It is, in the language of Macaulay, "To make the past present, to bring the distant near, to reveal the patriotism and heroic struggle of yesteryears—there are the duties of the historian."

"The unsolved riddle of mankind has been the reconciliation of liberty with power." The power of tyranny is the power to destroy; the goal of liberty is the aim to live. For centuries the battle, seen and unseen between absolutism and public freedom has been waged. It still goes on with no definite result and no decision. It seemed in 1835 when we laid the paradoxical corner stone of logs for Janesville that the divine right of any ruling class, whether king or satrap, capitalist or proletariat, to determine the destiny of this or any other nation had been defeated forever.

None of us will be here when a second century is celebrated and what we have done, the history and analysis of the people and their struggle of the first century, will be the landmarks by which another hundred years may be measured. There is no light like that of the lamp of experience. The future is not always judged by the past; it may only be guided.

Ever and ever the setting sun has lured the venturesome and courageous. Westward the star of empire has taken its slow, irresistible way.

Sang Bishop Berkeley:

"Behind the Indian's bark canoe
The steamboat puffs and raves
And city lots are advertised for sale

Ten thousand years ago the Aryan people, on the trail from Long Ago to Now, swept up out of the valley of the Indus through the narrow Himalaya mountain passes, conquered the Tartar of the high plateau, whelmed the desert dweller, built the cities of the plain, kept on to the Hellespont, overran southern Europe, established new kingdoms, new barbaric villages and principalities until their Caucasian children—Greek and Roman, Slav, Hun, Goth and Visigoth, Gaul, Celt, Teuton, Norseman, Angle and Saxon—mastered Europe.

But he was not contented there. He stood on the shore of a trackless sea. He looked into the imagined terrors of the restless and unconquerable ocean. He marveled at its chainless power. He saw where it carved the images of a thousand gods on the high cliffs along its shores. The Phoenician dared its fearsome mysteries. The Norseman trekked along its pathless waves to find a new world hidden in wilderness, mountain, and plain. An Italian, greedy for gold, and spurred by a thousand fantastic tales of the Asiatic El Dorado, mastered the waste of waters, to die, haunted by visions of India's coral strand and the fabled wealth of Cathay.

The western sun was still the magnet. The explorer came. He found America. He mapped its shores. He threaded its rivers and crossed its lakes. The priest, the preacher, and the teacher came; and then the pioneer, with Bible and rifle, with ax and plow. He built villages—they became cities. He laid out patches of garden—they became farms. He cut crooked trails for his cattle and wagons—they became great traveled highways. He made dugouts to carry his products to market—they grew into transportation lines, with canal boats, sailing vessels, steamboats, and steamships. He dammed the little streams and industry began to mark its place with song of wheel, murmur of grinding grain, and clang of iron and steel.

He landed in the warm and inviting Virginia; he came ashore at the bleak rock at Plymouth; he poled his canoe and flatboat up the Hudson and Mohawk; he stood under the great tree at the City of Brotherly Love; he found asylum in Maryland; he cut back the wilderness a few miles from the shores of the ocean that stood both as a barrier against his return to the homeland and as a bulwark against further tyranny. He sang his old French love songs in Wisconsin forests, trapped its beaver, traversed its pathless woods, told his stories of romance and adventure.

And still the western sun lured him on.

His patient oxen took him on new trails. He crossed mountains, periled by snow and avalanche. He forded rivers, risking death from whirlpool and flood. He dragged on over sodden ground, slowly, painfully, but persistently, chopping new roads, blazing new and hopeful highways that others might follow and be his neighbors. He dared the savage; he challenged Nature; he shook his fist in the face of difficulties; and finally he became the new settler in Wisconsin.

One hundred years ago he came. He hewed a new home from this wilderness. He lived from the forests. His rifle and shotgun were the butcher's check and the market man's delivery cart. He took the stored honey from the trees and traded it for flour and rusty pork. He fought—this settler with his family—the pressing horrors of isolation and starvation. Every farm home in all this great section of the State of Wisconsin is built on a battlefield where man contested with resisting Nature, and he won the final victory of success with a home and a family.

The road from today to yesterday does not seem long, measured in terms of years. The new settler in Janesville became an old settler in a decade. His sons and daughters again took the trail. Some remained, many went on toward the setting sun. There were other wildernesses to conquer, other trails to follow, wide-sweeping plains to cover with bands of railroad steel, another ocean to reach. And, lo, where there had been a wilderness, with its maddening and awful silence, where rivers ran eternally unladen to the sea, where savage reigned supreme, where wild forest denizens held high riotous carnival, there arose an empire of the common people within this century.

Had the commoner in Europe been content this world would still have been a realm of silence. Had the Virginian and the Yankee been content there would have been no Northwest Territory and no Wisconsin, no Rock County, and no village or city here. Had the German, the Irish, the Norwegian been content we should not have had him here as a solid citizen of Wisconsin.

This new Wisconsin was no place for the indolent, the coward, or the shirk. This was no place for the white-collared youth, the dilettante, or the effiminate. This was no place for the evanescent shadow of life, the social butterfly, or the drone. This was no place for the parasite or the aesthete.

Beauty was all around the old settler in the Rock River Valley. He had come to a place where every prospect pleases. From the hilltops he could see great waving forests of green. Between were silver sheens of lakes and bounded prairies. There flowers lifted blossoms to the sky in a barbaric riot of color, rivaling the sun in its chromatic display. The breath of spring, the sky of summer, the glory of the master paintings of the woods in the fall—there were pictures hung here by omnipotence for his delectation. The first settler needed no Louvre and no other gallery of art for his cultural side. Unconsciously his soul responded to this great oratorio without words and perhaps without understanding why.

The first settler got what he gave. He hid no talent lest someone should rob him. His home was his castle, his farm his landed domain, his retainers were all members of his own family. Each home was an industrial plant. Each member of the family had a task to perform. The farm was a way of living in its supremest sense. He had flour if he raised wheat. The packing house might be far away, but he had his own. His shoes were not made in a great factory; the cobbler at the cross roads slowly sewed and tapped them. His grist was ground at the mill close by. The streams were harnessed and the water wheel was a Hercules chained like a slave.

His music was the wind in the forest, the summer rain, the deeper diapason of the threatening storm, the beating of the snow against the glassless windows.

This United States, from the days when God was the pilot, when His stars, burning just as brightly and just as steadily as now, led mankind, with cloud by day and pillar of fire by night, to the rock shores of this woodland world, was settled by poor people. No one gave them anything. They had no subsidy. They were not fed on any appropriation by a prodigal Government. No tax levy was made to present them a log cabin, or to buy a ripsaw to make boards for floors, supply tools or equipment.

They did not share wealth; they shared work. They did not share grandeur; they shared simplicity. They acquired riches out of the soil, in trade and commerce, and by working from sunup to sundown.

There isn't a dollar of wealth or value or intrinsic worth here in Janesville, in Wisconsin, or in the world that does not represent labor or services. There was no magic about it. There was no miracle in it. No man's voice said, "Let there be a new world", and behold a new world existed. No; not that way. Rippling muscles, back-breaking toil, made Wisconsin. Liberty is never written by wealth or power. It is written in sweat and blood of the common people.

Liberty is written by men and by women who want freedom of opportunity untrammeled by hampering law that puts incapable, collective authority in charge of daily tasks.

The common people wanted free speech that they might express themselves when oppressed by ill-conceived laws or burdensome taxes. They wanted the right to worship God where and when and how they saw fit. They wanted to be safe in their own homes without search and seizure unless by due trial and examination they had forfeited property. They wanted the right to move from one place to another without restraint. So they wrote these things into a fundamental law, the oldest document of its kind in operative existence, and repeated these principles when they formed a State. It was the first Constitution written with the pen of human rights and conceived in justice. That is why it lived.

Three great documents express American ideals. They are the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution of the United States, and the Ordinance of 1787, creating the Northwest Territory. We are one of the five States erected from that Territory. It was dedicated to freemen and free labor. It was built on a foundation of education and religion.

Here was Wisconsin Territory released from fear of hostile Indians in 1835, with no white men in all that ragged triangle reaching from Green Bay to Chicago, with one trading post at Milwaukee and a trader at what is now Waukesha, then called Prairie Village. West, a little lead mine near New Glarus, held a few white men. North Portage, with its old Fort Winnebago, was the nearest settlement. Near Monroe, Andrew Clarno had a farm.

Here then came the first settler in 1835. We celebrate his coming in this centennial. I have no time to deal with the daily chronology of incidentals. That we leave for the writer of detail. We must look this morning, here in the first day of our celebration of the passing of a century, at the whole picture. History is the story of people.

There will never be another epic like this of ours in western settlement. It can never be written again. There is but one Iliad, but one Odyssey for the West. It is not the story of conquest, or blood and pillage and murder. It had no Joshua leading with armed men to a land flowing with milk and honey, by the route of blood and terror. It is not the story of looting that the looter might be rich. It is the greatest of all romances of peace.

These men, carried by slow oxen, were seeking homes. They wanted property. They wanted their own land. They wanted the right to occupy it for themselves and be free from bond labor. They were not asking for or seeking political liberty. They were not asking a government to loan them or to provide them anything beyond opportunity. They were asking for individual independence and individual rights. They wanted the further right to make a profit. They wanted the right to buy and sell, to raise what they pleased on what land they owned and to sell it where and how and when they pleased. They knew property in itself had no right but that they, as persons, had protected rights in property. They got that in Wisconsin.

One hundred years ago there was no sawmill in Janesville or in all this region; no grist mill, no railroad, no telegraph, no telephone, no sewing machine, no highways, no fences, no board or brick or stone houses, no stores selling other than the simplest things, no farm machinery, no mills for woolens or cottons, no water power harnessed, no bridges, no theaters or circuses, no musical instruments in homes, no stoves, no steel plows, no schools, no churches, no steamboats, no lumber jacks, no rafts on the rivers, no wheat fields in southern Wisconsin.

"All this shall be added unto you" was as yet an unfulfilled promise. The first genuine settlement in Wisconsin was here in Janesville. Others who came to the territory had been adventurers. Here to Janesville and the river valley came men and women to make homes, till lands, bear children, rear families, add wealth from the soil, from timber, and what else had been provided them by a generous Creator. Elsewhere were traders with Indians, little outfitters for explorers, nomad miners, ready to leave when ore failed. Here in Janesville, for the first time, there was written in dirt and sweat of toil, over the lintel of the doorpost of every cabin, "permanent."

When the frightened troops of General Atkinson drove the Sac Indians into the Wisconsin River they crashed down the gates that had barred the way of settlement.

The Holmes boys, young and ambitious, John Inman, a little older, George Follmer, still older, found the gate open and in 2 days gave the reason for this centennial celebration in the rude log house on the river bank across from the Big Rock.

Outside, eagerly waiting, were a quarter of million people. They came in droves, herds, armies, swept over whole townships and counties, engulfed great areas, like a tidal wave in the western Pacific, made a town in a week, a city in a month, started governments locally and generally; erected a Territory and then a State. We incorporated this city. We were troubled with growing pains. We put a harness on water power. We began to make brick. We began to grind grain. Golden wheat dictated economic standing. In 20 years this region was the breadbasket of America and Janesville its greatest food market. Storekeepers came. Women began to change from the home-made dress to "boughten" things at stores. Stores were everywhere. The eternal avant-courier of the new world—the blacksmith—was busy shoeing oxen and horses. Trees had been cut away. Trails became highways. Plank roads were laid and the first pavement succeeded the corduroy. Bridges were built. In a decade, 300,000 people came to southern Wisconsin.

Liberty's lamp was brightly burning on Atlantic shores. It was a beacon of invitation. Its beams were lighting the dark shores of Europe. People submerged for centuries, tramped on, dictated to, regimented, and abased were seeing light. The power of the printed word was growing. Newspapers were multiplying; knowledge was spreading. Coals of fire were heaped on breasts of dying despotisms. De Tocqueville had written Democracy in America, and the intelligentsia across the water began to understand the individualistic principles of American government.

So oppressed peoples started westward. The Norsemen came, to be a great power in Wisconsin. They brought the printing press and religious culture. Wherever the Norwegian settled was a church. The tyranny of a vapid and vicious king sent a million Germans to America. One-fourth of them found asylum in southern Wisconsin. They gave to Wisconsin statesmen, writers, newspapermen, sound citizens. From Scotland, seeking homes and lands away from the laws of primogeniture and entailments, came the Scotch, who gave a new meaning to thrift and saving. Came, too, the Irish, seeking some place where landlordism was unknown, and builded a new land of the shamrock and lilting song in a new world.

The logical sequence of settlement was a log house, a plot for crops, a school, a church, better schools, a government locally and general, a market, trade and business. These were as sequential as day follows night. Good times and hard times were met, overcome, and conquered. Living as these men and women did in Janesville, they found no difficulty in supporting the Union in its hour of travail when Lincoln called. They went to war—2,800 from Rock County—fought in its battles, died as soldiers must die, left homes and crops to women and children, and the survivors returned to take their places again in the ranks of those who lived the commonplace lives of an honest people. They have joined the "phantom army"—all but a few—marching to heavenly music of union and harmony and leaving a lesson of devotion to American ideals imperishable as granite.

Woman made Wisconsin possible. There could not then be, cannot be now, a home without the woman. First in the mind of the first settler was his wife. She was a partner in the pioneer task. To me the greatest moment in the history of Janesville was when Mrs. Samuel St. John, in that rude lean-to cabin over there, across from Monterey rock, without physician or midwife, without woman's aid or kindly sympathy and understanding, surrounded only by inexperienced young men and husband, willing but helpless, gave birth to Seth St. John, first white baby born on Rock River in Wisconsin. I ask all you mothers, and you fathers as well, to look within that cabin where nine people ate and slept, upon that rude pallet, in a bed built into the log walls, with nothing but the simplest of accessories upon that hour of the nativity in Janesville. Christ was born in a manger, with lowing kine and hay-crunching asses stabled all about the accouching mother, yet women were with her.

Like Lincoln, born in a cabin without doors or windows, such pioneer babies came into this world. The mother of this first Janesville baby gave her life in this sacrifice, and her grave, marked with a boulder on the wind-swept hill south of the city, should forever remain as a shrine to motherhood.

These pioneer women were full partners in founding Wisconsin. I pluck no laurel wreath from the crown of any early statesmen; I take away no decoration from the breast of a hero who gave his life or made other sacrifice in laying the structure of this Republic or in erecting the facade of the new Temple of Human Justice for the common people here in Wisconsin; but take the hands of the first settlers' wives and lead them from the self-conscious obscurity in which they have been placed and give them a niche in the American Hall of Fame among the builders of the Nation.

These mothers traveled the same wilderness road into new dangers from Indian and wild beast. They kept the home fires burning, nursed the sick, and lived through unnumbered woes. The story of these early mothers is the glowing, glorious epic of womanhood in the building of this city and county.

I am reluctant to close. There are so many things to say and to tell in such a history of a century. The story of a community is the story of its people. There is no glory like that of the commonplace. The glory of arms, of politics is of individual greatness and is evanescent. Eternity is measured in daily tasks performed and daily work well done. This was a land of commonplaces.

Let me not be misunderstood. There never was perfect content in the majority. Vast property interests and management problems called for practical executive ability, while millions hungry for some mystic bread of life asked for land, roads, freedom, chances, open doors, release somewhere and somehow from the clutches that held them to monotony and toil.

Some obscure historian has said that and more, "On the one hand were those wanting refined mechanics of adjustment and on the other hand those who wanted songs, slogans, words worth dying for; and between was the mass who lived by bread alone. They were the vast, breathing, groaning, snarling, singing, murmuring, irreckonable instrument through which, and on which, history and destiny and politicians worked—the people—the public that had to be reached for the making of public opinion."

Behind us is a century. It may be divided into three parts; that day of the pioneer of 20 years, the days when the readjustment came from the Civil War and after. What may we learn from that time? Is there anything in the past to guide us for the future? What is written on the tombstones of these pioneers—a pointing finger to a road that we may follow?

This was the manner of men and women who came to Janesville and built a city. This was the manner of men who laid the foundations of this beautiful community where people have been born and lived and died for a century. We are giving it a benediction this day in 1935.

These men were individualists. They held out no tin cup for government alms. They supported government—the government did not support them. They believed that government was made for and by the people, and not the people by the government. No man was regimented in 1835 or thereafter. No man borrowed an ax to hew out his home. They asked no man to do more than they were willing to give. They were ready to share with every task. They divided the labor—their wealth was their own to do with as they pleased. What they got came from their own toil and saving and thrift. All wealth here in Janesville and this valley as elsewhere was created by work and not by legislation.

The first settlers wanted a coherent union. They went forth to bloody battlefields to keep it so. They were the normal American citizens, nurtured in tradition and ancestry from eastern colonial peoples, seekers getting away from oppression, who came here because they wanted freedom from autocratic dictation and confiscation by taxation.

So they erected this city; so they built a State; so they became a part of the Nation. To paraphrase a poet:

"Here in our sight where memory doth enshroud us
Lies that fair city in which our hearts abide,
And in its bliss there is naught more wondrous told
Than those few words, 'Thou shalt be satisfied.'"

CONFIDENCE GAME—EDITORIAL FROM PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record of Wednesday, July 10, 1935, dealing with the pending holding-company bill.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of Wednesday, July 10, 1935]

CONFIDENCE GAME

The holding companies have just sold the American people another gold brick.

The real reason the holding companies forced the House version of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill through the lower Chamber in place of the Senate's version is that the House version seems to them to stand on weaker constitutional grounds.

All the weeping about the "death sentence" against holding companies in the Senate bill, all the support for the "fairer" House version was coverup for a scheme to put through a bill the Supreme Court would be likely to nullify.

What the holding companies were really playing for was not a bill without the "death sentence", but a bill that would fall down in a court test.

This ranks about top in the record of shoddy maneuvers pulled off on the American people.

Proof? Plenty. The Senate bill called for abolition of useless holding companies by 1942, while the House bill leaves it up to the Securities and Exchange Commission to determine whether any holding companies, and which, shall be abolished.

The House bill seems on its face strong enough seriously to worry utility executives, since the administration could be expected to control the S. E. C. Why was it supported?

It was supported because it delegates the life-and-death power to a commission. The Supreme Court has shown in recent decisions its distaste for broad delegation of constitutional power. The mandatory abolition might have survived a court test; the utilities feel the delegated powers cannot survive the test.

For all their pious ejaculations about "protecting the investor" and "regulation, not destruction" the utilities put through the House amendments not to change the bill, but to kill the bill, to kill all Federal regulation.

That explains the mysterious manner in which utility stocks and bonds have been keeping the high levels they reached after the President's defeat by the power lobby. There would be plenty of dumping, and the stocks would be down if the utilities felt that even the House bill would stand. They feel it won't stand.

They think they have fooled the public. That's why the RECORD's average of 20 utility stocks yesterday was 22.83 against a 1935 low of 14.46, and the average for 10 utility bonds was 104.77 against a 1935 low of 99.94.

That is why Associated Gas & Electric, after spending its utility companies' money in a giant campaign against the Senate version of the bill, now spends more funds for advertisements attacking the House version as "tainted with unconstitutionality."

The utilities put over that "tainted" version. They sold the public a leaky boat for a long trip, because they don't want the trip completed.

The only consolation is that the public won't be fooled so easily when next the holding companies put their hands over their hearts and say they are in favor of "regulation, not destruction."

They move too fast to be regulated.

MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS BY QUIN O'BRIEN

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I tender at this time for publication in the RECORD an address delivered over the radio on May 30, 1935, by one of America's great orators and eminent lawyers, Hon. Quin O'Brien, of Chicago, Ill. I ask that this masterful address be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, assuring the Senate of literary and historical compensation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Under the free-born flag of our beloved country, amid the fragrance of the flowers of spring, the people of this mighty Republic today pause from their labors to join in prayer and praise for our sacred dead who in war and in peace laid their sacrifices on the altar of devotion. This great memorial holiday is a day of joy and not of sorrow. As Lincoln said, amid the myriad graves of Gettysburg, it is a time when we, the living, should "take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion." It is a time to take our bearings from the sun and stars and our long-traveled course that we may right our ship of state for its future journey with full speed ahead. It is a noble land that God has given us; a land that can feed and clothe; that can comfort, enlighten, and lead the world. It is a mighty people that He has planted on this soil of freedom; a people sprung from the most masterly bloods and the most intrepid souls of history. In three centuries, with banners on which were inscribed "Free Conscience", "Free Speech", "Free Press", "Free Schools", "Free Ballots", our intrepid pioneers marched westward with "the star of empire", from the snows of Plymouth Rock to the Golden Gate of sunset, developing our vast domain, which they dedicated to liberty and law and to—

"One flag, one land, one heart, one hand, one nation evermore."

And all this was done, not by fire and sword, but with plow and press, Bibles and ballot boxes, schoolbooks and scythes, and the arts and crafts of an adventurous people, who reared in this western world a mighty Republic designed to be first in peace, last in war, and first in the hearts of humanity.

The past at least is secure, but what of the future? We are now emerging from a world crisis in a great transition period in the affairs of men. The past 20 years have been the Gethsemane of nations. In the World War bleeding humanity cried out, "O God, let this chalice pass from us!" In the aftermath of depression it has groaned at its betrayal and trembled at the thought of civilization's Calvary. Today, thank God, we are witnessing the Easter dawn of the Resurrection. Out of this is coming a new era and a new order of things. There has been a great moral and social awakening, and the most hopeful sign of the times is that the current of reform is almost world-wide, under the leadership of America. The same challenge of the power of vested interests, the same demand for equality, the same striving to lift the average man and woman up to a wider and fuller participation in the blessings of life and modern society is manifest everywhere. In the past few years kings, kaisers, czars, and barons of wealth have been toppled from their thrones. In the language of blessed Mary's Magnificat, "The proud and mighty have been put down from their seats", and the tide of events has "exalted them of low degree."

This is a time which tries men's souls and many are fearful. Fellow Americans, be not alarmed, this is but the ferment of democracy. There will be no explosion, there will be no revolution, there will be no dictatorship, there will be no atheistic sovietism, there will be no pagan Nazism, no tyrannical Fascism in free America. We are immune to these heresies. Love of liberty, lust of land, pride of private ownership, craving for individuality, independence of spirit, and faith in God are all too inherent in the American character and American institutions to ever permit cults of tyranny to enslave us.

The main cause of the world's chaos and unrest, and the subject of its chief clamor, is found in the abuses of capitalism. Capitalism, which built up the towering structures of our industrial and financial institutions, sinned grievously and must do penance. In its greed for power and wealth it debauched our public officials, abused its privileges, and oppressed the sons of toil. In an orgy of speculation it brought down its towering structures and almost suffered the fate of blind Samson in the ruins it wrought. The red Communists exaggerate these evils and seek to destroy capitalism utterly, and in doing so would throttle the liberties, civil and religious, of all humankind. The American people will never jump from the frying pan of distorted capitalism to the fire of communism. Rather will it chasten, purify, and salvage capitalism. It will teach it that it holds its wealth as a trust to be administered for the people's welfare and that honesty is ever the best policy.

In the past few years we have done much toward this end, we have stopped the exploitation of unschooled children, we have tapped hoarded wealth to feed and clothe the Nation's unemployed, we have stopped the robbery of natural resources, we have required the guarantee of the people's bank deposits, we have transferred our money control from Wall Street to Washington, we have curbed stock juggling and gambling, we have rescued the farmer and the home owner from the mortgage foreclosure and receivership rackets. In short, we are putting justice in business as well as in the courts. We are putting conscience in commerce as well as in the churches.

The nineteenth century saw the greatest revolution of modern times—that from feudalism to industrialism; from the control of kings to the control of capital. Giant corporations with special privileges assumed the powers of kings and their divine right to rule. The twentieth century will see ever a greater revolution—that from the control of capital to the control of men, not Soviet men but enlightened men, who have not tried to throw off the control of God, and who would die themselves rather than enslave and slaughter their fellow men. Democracy, the child of Christianity, is determined to control capital, its economic brother. And what is more, it is firmly resolved, to moralize the social order. All that Democracy demands is common honesty, an equitable distribution of wealth, just service for a reasonable profit, and a recognition that the people of America are masters and not servants. It is not seeking to destroy the temple of private property but to drive from it the unjust money changers.

American democracy, as interpreted by the statesmen of our two great parties, aims to make every man capable of becoming a capitalist by a more just distribution of wealth. On the other hand, communism, according to its own manifestos, aims, by force, revolution, and bloodshed, if necessary, to confiscate the property and wealth of all the people and consolidate and administer it by a soviet oligarchy which denies God and proscribes all religion as moral and mental poison.

Our people, and especially our high-school and college students, should be taught that communism is a far worse and more cruel slavery that human chattelhood, which lit the fires of civil war and cost the lives of a half million of America's young manhood and that of Lincoln. Communism is a blend of anarchy and atheism. It is repugnant to all that Christianity, democracy, and Americanism stand for, and is the greatest possible treason to our institutions. To paraphrase the words and warning of Abraham Lincoln, "A house divided against itself cannot stand. This Government cannot endure permanently half slave and half free." There is not room enough in this ocean-bound Republic, or its free air, for both communism and democracy.

When the apostles of American liberty met in Independence Hall on our Nation's pentacostal day to draft our charter of government, their leader, George Washington, like the inspired Peter, speaking no less to posterity than to the assembled delegates, solemnly said: "Let us raise a standard to which the wise and honest can repair. The event is in the hands of God." We Americans of today are the trustees of that Constitution and Government for the benefit of our people and unborn millions. This week the most august court in all the world, in three opinions, unanimously vindicated the power and blessings of that historic Constitution. The voices of Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Madison, Hamilton, Wilson, Elsworth, Randolph, and Rutledge and their compeers seem to call to us this Memorial Day across the chasm of 150 years and bid us keep their beloved America an ideal Republic in which those twin monuments of their joint wisdom, the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States, shall forever stand, like the last mountain in the deluge, unique, majestic, magnificent. The American people, from our noble President down, answer them and our heroic dead from Bunker Hill to Flanders Fields, "Sleep on, brave souls; rest in peace! God reigns, and our Constitution and our consciences still live!"

REGULATION OF PUBLIC-UTILITY HOLDING COMPANIES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] that the conferees to be appointed on the part of the Senate be instructed not to insist on section 11 as agreed to by the Senate in the bill (S. 2796) to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating, or marketing securities in interstate and foreign commerce through the mails, to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce, to amend the Federal Water Power Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in approaching the question involved in the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH] that the Senate not insist upon section 11 as agreed to by it, I wish to call attention to the fact, and have it clearly in the minds of Senators, that section 11 of the bill as adopted by the Senate deals not only with the elimination of holding companies but likewise deals with the reorganization of holding companies and also with foreign holding companies. Consequently, if the motion instructing the conferees on the part of the Senate not to insist upon section 11 of the Senate bill should be adopted, it would mean that we would have to abandon the position we have taken not only with reference to the elimination but with reference to the reorganization of holding companies, that provision having been put into the bill solely and exclusively for the purpose of protecting the investors of these various companies.

If section 11 of the House bill, in its entirety, should be accepted, there would be no provision, as I see it and as the Securities Commission see it, setting forth a proper method for reorganization or a proper method for the protection of investors in these holding companies.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Yesterday I inquired of the Senator from Montana whether he was correctly or incorrectly quoted in certain newspapers, which represented the Senator as stating that if this bill were sent to conference, and section 11 were not retained, the bill would be permitted to die in conference. The Senator stated that he had made no such statement, and he certainly satisfied me on that point. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana, if this bill should be sent to conference and there should be an agreement between the conferees as to all the amendments in controversy between the two Houses, with the exception of section 11, whether the Senator will state to the Senate that it would be his purpose to report such disagreement to the Senate at this session, so that the Senate would have an opportunity to vote upon the question at issue?

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that there would not be any other intention in my mind, for if I should serve upon the conference committee I should feel that I was not representing my own personal views in the matter but that I was representning the views of the Senate. Consequently, if the conferees could not agree upon section 11, or some other provision in its stead, I would then feel that it was my duty as one of the conferees to bring the disagreement back to the Senate and ask for further instructions with reference to the matter.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, if the Senator from Montana will yield further, I should like to ask the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], in view of the statement of the Senator from Montana that he was incorrectly quoted and that if the bill shall be sent to conference without instructions he will endeavor to adjust the differences between the two Houses and if there should be a disagreement upon section 11 he will report back to the Senate at this session, whether or not the Senator from Illinois will not withdraw his motion to instruct the conferees?

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, the statements now made rather change the position as I understood it to be yesterday. As I now understand the position of the Senator from Montana it would be my purpose to withdraw the motion. I understand his position to be that if the bill goes to conference and the conferees reach an agreement on all other provisions and fail to reach an agreement on section 11, he will bring the bill back to the Senate for the action of the Senate in reference to instructing or otherwise dealing with the subject matter of the disagreement.

Mr. WHEELER. I should feel it to be my duty to do so.

Mr. DIETERICH. Then, if the Senator will yield further, in view of that statement I withdraw my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order heretofore entered providing for a vote at 2 o'clock is rescinded. The Chair appoints the following conferees on Senate bill 2796: The Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BROWN], the Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD].

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, is prepared to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act. He is now on his way to the Chamber. There is pending before the Senate, however, the water carriers bill. I inquire of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], who is in charge of that bill, whether he desires at this time to proceed with that bill or is he willing to have it laid aside?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, as the Senator from Arkansas knows, my time has been taken up for the last 2 or 3 days by the holding-company bill, which has just been disposed of. I should much prefer to let the so-called "A. A. A. bill" be considered at this time, but I should like to have an opportunity to take up the other bill before the session closes.

Mr. ROBINSON. In the absence of the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry [Mr. SMITH], who is on his way to the Chamber, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the water-carrier bill would then go back to the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes; it would be displaced.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, by unanimous consent a few moments ago disposition was made of the agreement under which a vote was to be taken at 2 o'clock today on the holding-company bill, and the bill has been sent to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. McNARY. The pending measure now before the Senate is the so-called "Wheeler bill", affecting water-borne traffic, and to bring it under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Is the Senator from Montana now consenting to a withdrawal of the unfinished business and its restoration to the calendar?

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, if I may answer the inquiry, let me say that, in view of the statement just made by the Senator from Montana, I have moved to proceed to the consideration of another bill, which would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business.

Mr. McNARY. I was not clear whether it was to be a displacement or merely a temporary laying aside during the consideration of the A. A. A. amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON. If my motion shall be agreed to, it would have the effect of displacing the unfinished business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, there is some opposition to the bill. I note the absence at the moment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. ROBINSON. I shall suggest the absence of a quorum if the Senator desires.

Mr. McNARY. I think that had better be done.

Mr. ROBINSON. Very well. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Bilbo	Byrd	Coolidge
Ashurst	Black	Byrnes	Copeland
Austin	Bone	Capper	Costigan
Bachman	Borah	Caraway	Davis
Bailey	Brown	Carey	Dickinson
Bankhead	Bulkley	Chavez	Dieterich

Hastings	Maloney	Reynolds	Van Nuys
Hatch	Metcalf	Robinson	Wagner
Hayden	Minton	Russell	Walsh
Holt	Moore	Schall	Wheeler
Johnson	Murphy	Schwellenbach	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8492.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with amendments.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, and that committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The clerk will state the first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The first amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 3, line 2, after the word "than", to strike out the comma and "or is likely during the current or next succeeding marketing year for such commodity to be less than the fair exchange value thereof, and" and insert "the fair exchange value thereof, or the average farm price of such commodity is likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, and", so as to read:

SEC. 2. Section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out everything preceding subsection (2) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(1) Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that:

"(a) The current average farm price for any basic agricultural commodity is less than the fair exchange value thereof, or the average farm price of such commodity is likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, and"

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 16, after the word "title", to strike out the words "and that the exercise of any one or more of such powers would be administratively practicable"; and in line 21, after the word "shall", to insert the words "proclaim such determination and shall", so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) The conditions of and factors relating to the production, marketing, and consumption of such commodity are such that the exercise of any one or more of the powers conferred upon the Secretary under subsections (2) and (3) of this section would tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title, he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine such facts. If, upon the basis of such investigation, the Secretary finds the existence of such facts, he shall proclaim such determination and shall exercise such one or more of the powers conferred upon him under subsections (2) and (3) of this section as he finds, upon the basis of such investigation, administratively practicable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 19, before the words "to be made", to insert "subject to the consent of the producer", so as to read:

"(2) Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall provide, through agreements with producers or by other voluntary methods—

"(a) For such adjustment in the acreage or in the production for market, or both, of any basic agricultural commodity, as he finds, upon the basis of the investigation made pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, will tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title, and to make such adjustment program practicable to operate and administer, and

"(b) For rental or benefit payments in connection with such agreements or methods in such amounts as he finds, upon the basis of such investigation, to be fair and reasonable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title and to make such program practicable to operate and administer, to be paid out of any moneys available for such payments or, subject to the consent of the producer, to be made in quantities of one or more basic agricultural commodities acquired by the Secretary pursuant to this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 17, after the word "than", to strike out the comma and "and is not likely during the current or next succeeding marketing year for such commodity to be less than the fair exchange value thereof, or" and insert "the fair exchange value thereof, and the average farm price for such commodity is not likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, or", so as to read:

"(3) Subject to the provisions of subsection (1) of this section, the Secretary of Agriculture shall make payments, out of any moneys available for such payments, in such amounts as he finds, upon the basis of the investigation made pursuant to subsection (1) of this section, to be fair and reasonable and best calculated to effectuate the declared policy of this title:

"(a) To remove from the normal channels of trade and commerce quantities of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(b) To expand domestic or foreign markets for any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof;

"(c) In connection with the production of that part of any basic agricultural commodity which is required for domestic consumption.

"(4) Whenever, during a period during which any of the powers conferred in subsection (2) or (3) is being exercised, the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that, with respect to any basic agricultural commodity:

"(a) The current average farm price for such commodity is not less than the fair exchange value thereof, and the average farm price for such commodity is not likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, or."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, we are proceeding so rapidly that I cannot turn the pages of the bill with sufficient celerity to keep up. May we have the amendment again reported?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will again state the amendment.

The Chief Clerk again stated the amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the chairman of the committee should explain the reason for the insertion of this language and the elimination of the original language.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, he being a member of the committee, at every meeting of the committee we had present a majority of the members. After full consideration it was determined that the language proposed to be inserted was more in conformity with the practices of the different departments, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and others, and that the new language would come nearer expressing the purposes and ideas than would the language of the House bill. The new language is:

The fair exchange value thereof, and the average farm price for such commodity is not likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, or.

Then follows the original language of the bill, so that it provides that there may be ascertained just what is the fair exchange value during the current year, as distinguished from the language used by the House. That was unanimously agreed to by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know what the amendment is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will restate the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 5, line 17, after the word "than", it is proposed to strike out the comma and all down to and including the word "or", in line 20, and to insert in lieu thereof:

The fair exchange value thereof, and the average farm price for such commodity is not likely to be less than the fair exchange value thereof for the period in which the production of such commodity during the current or next succeeding marketing year is normally marketed, or.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 6, after the word "title", to strike out "or that the exercise thereof would not be administratively practicable", so as to make the paragraph read:

(b) The conditions of and factors relating to the production, marketing, and consumption of such commodity are such that none of the powers conferred in subsections (2) and (3), and no combination of such powers would, if exercised, tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 10, after the word "he", to insert "shall proclaim such determination, and"; in line 13, after the word "such", to strike out "finding" and insert "proclamation"; in line 14, after the word "new", to strike out "finding" and insert "proclamation"; and in line 15, after the word "section", to insert "except insofar as the exercise of such power is necessary to carry out obligations of the Secretary assumed, prior to the date of such proclamation made pursuant to this subsection, in connection with the exercise of any of the powers conferred upon him under subsections (2) or (3) of this section", so as to make the paragraph read:

he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made to determine such facts. If, upon the basis of such investigation, the Secretary finds the existence of such facts, he shall proclaim such determination, and shall not exercise any of such powers with respect to such commodity after the end of the marketing year current at the time when such proclamation is made and prior to a new proclamation under subsection (1) of this section——

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from South Carolina will explain the purpose and effect of some of these amendments before they are adopted.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was about to make the same request which has just been made by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VAN NUYS in the chair). Will the Senator from Virginia state his request?

Mr. BYRD. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina to return to the top of page 5, and to explain what is meant there by the words:

To remove from the normal channels of trade and commerce quantities of any basic agricultural commodity or product thereof.

Is the meaning of those words that the particular commodity is going to be destroyed, or how will it be taken out of the normal channels of trade and commerce?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Virginia is as familiar as I with the conditions which existed, which brought about an effort to enact legislation of this kind. We were confronted with enormous surpluses. I had the privilege of introducing what was known as the "option plan", which attempted to remove some of the surpluses by substituting them for subsequent production.

The plan worked admirably. Anyone who is at all familiar with farm products knows that very often the price goes below the cost of production; and when our foreign markets were practically destroyed by the cataclysm which occurred in 1929, particularly those farm products which were produced in excess of domestic consumption were piled up in this country. There was no domestic demand for the excess, and no chance to sell it abroad; and the consequence was that the price went down below the cost of production. The common-sense view was that if we had already produced more than could be domestically consumed or sent abroad, and the price was below the cost of production, the Government should assume the ownership of the excess and redistribute it to the producers in lieu of subsequent production.

The result was that through that option plan large quantities of these surpluses were substituted for subsequent production, thereby restoring the action of the law of supply and demand, and giving the producer the benefit of the subsequent rise in price of the crop he had already produced rather than leaving it in speculative hands for speculators to have the benefit as against the man who would produce another crop.

That is the object of that provision of the bill. I think the Senator from Virginia would be heartily in accord with any plan by which, whenever for any reason a surplus should be accumulated sufficient to force the price of a commodity below the cost of production, an arrangement should be made that the producer might, by reducing his subsequent production, be the beneficiary of the surplus he had already produced.

That is the object of that provision. I hope the explanation is satisfactory to the Senator.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest to the able chairman of the committee this procedure: I think very few Members of the Senate are familiar with these amendments and the reasons why they are recommended. The members of the committee, of course, are very familiar with them. If the Senator from South Carolina would take up the amendments one by one, and explain as we go along their general purpose, stating at the same time what is really wrong with the organic act, I think it would do a great deal to make the various proposals clear to the minds of Senators.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, when I planned to ask for the consideration of this bill I intended to address the Senate as to its general purpose, and then, if anyone asked for an explanation, to explain, so far as the chairman was able to do so, the changes made in the House text by the Senate committee. I was busily engaged in preparing myself for that, thinking we would take up the bill at 2 o'clock after the fulfillment of the unanimous-consent agreement. I did not know the unanimous-consent agreement would be withdrawn, and therefore was not present when that action was taken. I desire to take this occasion to explain my attitude, as chairman of the committee, toward these amendments.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, would it not be well for the Senator to do that now?

Mr. SMITH. I am going to begin now.

Mr. WALSH. Very well. In other words, the Senator now is going to discuss the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I am going to discuss it as it now stands. That is what I am about to do.

In the first place, Mr. President, I wish all Members of the Senate were present, for I think it is essential in discussing the amendments to this bill to have the Senate become farmer-minded, to consider the farmer in the relation which he now bears and has borne from time immemorial to our organized society. I take it that the bill is an attempt on the part of the Government to set up an organization for the farmer which will stand as a bulwark against the organized processors and distributors.

From time immemorial the farmer has been exploited because he was unorganized. Every Senator who is at all familiar with farming understands that the man who produces the raw material in the field never has had a voice in the price he has received. He pays the freight, he pays all the expenses incidental to production, and the price he receives is what is left after the purchaser has deducted all the expense incidental to the purchase. Then, if anything is left, the producer gets it. If what he receives is less than the cost of production he accepts that, until today more than 50 percent of the farms of America, regardless of their location, are under mortgage.

This is an attempt on the part of the Government to create a line of resistance for the benefit of the farmer. There may be in the bill, and there appear to be from time to time, what seem to be arbitrary provisions; but I desire to have Senators bear in mind that, this being an effort on the part of the Government to recognize the unorganized and helpless condition of the farmer, we are attempting to create an organization which will stand in lieu of the organization with which he has to deal.

In addition to that, there is not a provision in the bill which does not predicate its enactment upon the consent of the producer. That privilege is extended to him in every section of the bill. His majority consent is made the basis of any enactment in the bill. There is presented to him this proposition: How does this seem to you? Is it efficient in enabling you, through the agency of the Government, to receive at least some semblance of return for the wealth you produce?

There are certain features which I have never supported and never can support. One is the high protective tariff. I have never considered that the Congress had any right to impose a protective tariff. We can provide for a tariff for revenue, which may be burdensome at times, but we have no constitutional right to impose a protective tariff. The power is not given in the Constitution. But so far as this bill is concerned, from start to finish it provides for action by and with the consent of the producer.

I am asking Senators, when they come to criticize the bill, to make their criticisms constructive in reference to the unorganized, helpless farmers, and not destructive criticisms, for the benefit of those who have exploited the farmer from time immemorial.

I am no more enthusiastic than are other Senators about dictatorship. There is no place in the United States for the voice of a dictator. It is an alien and obnoxious voice. It ought always to be denounced wherever it shows itself or makes an intimation of its intent. The pending measure is as far removed from the idea of dictatorship in reference to the man who produces as it could be. I hope the Senate will have clearly in mind the distinction between processors and distributors and the man who, in the field, in the sun, in the rain, in the winter, spring, and summer gambles with Nature as to what he will produce—unorganized, incapable of organization—yet the aggregate of whose efforts feeds the Nation and furnishes the material out of which the Nation is clothed. I want Senators in acting on this bill to consider that man, and not the man who processes and distributes. Let us first take care of the man who produces that upon which we live, and the others will be certain to take care of themselves.

I hope that those who come prepared to antagonize the bill on the ground of it being a bill to delegate arbitrary and dictatorial powers will consider the fact that there is not an element in it or a provision in it that is not predicated upon the vote of the man who produces. Let us all consider that fact, and if we have a criticism to make, let us remember those in the field who are producing the foodstuffs, who have asked and voted overwhelmingly for the provisions of this bill.

Mr. President, we talk about the law of supply and demand.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. Let me finish this thought. We talk about the law of supply and demand. There is another law which is as irrevocable as is the law of supply and demand. I refer to the law by which everything takes the line of least resistance. Everything moves along the line of least resistance. Every element of Nature moves along the line of least resistance, and that law is as potent and deadly in the realm of commerce as it is in the natural world. Consequently, all those who deal in farm products get their profits out of the depression of farm prices, because the farmer offers the line of least resistance.

What business is there in the United States today that pays the freight, except the business of farming, where the producers receive for their goods what is left after those who handle them have deducted every expense incident to the handling? In the case of one commodity with which I am particularly familiar there is a contract which is an institution, known as the "cif and six" contract, so named because those are the initials of the things which characterize the contract—cost, insurance, freight, and 6 percent for tariff. The man who produces the material does not even get paid for the wrappings in which he is compelled to package his product. Six percent is deducted before the price is fixed, together with all the costs incident to handling—cost, insurance, freight, "cif and six." If there is anything left, the producer gets it, and if not, he can produce some more.

The pending measure is an attempt on the part of the Government—I take it to be an honest attempt—to set up an organization which will function in some degree for the benefit of the man who is unorganized, but upon whom we are all dependent. Once again let me ask the Members of this body, in considering this bill and asking the meaning of any amendment, to keep in mind that the entire bill is for the purpose of giving to the producer of the raw material at least a partial chance of sharing in the wealth he produces.

This is a producer's bill, and we are attempting to control the processor in the instrument that is invoked here for the purpose of handing back to the producer a part of the profit to which he is entitled.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I now yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BYRD. The Senator just stated that no restrictions could be placed on the producer without his consent. I will ask him to refer to page 20, subsection (8)——

Mr. SMITH. I know to what the Senator refers.

Mr. BYRD. Which gives to 50 percent of the handlers of any commodity the right to impose licenses, or orders or whatever they may be called, on the producers, without a vote on the part of the producers.

Mr. SMITH. To what does the Senator refer?

Mr. BYRD. I refer to subsection (8) on page 20.

Mr. SMITH. That is predicated upon the producers agreeing beforehand.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator show me where the producers are to agree?

Mr. SMITH. It reads:

> The volume of the commodity or product thereof covered by such order which is produced or marketed within the production or marketing area defined in such order have signed a marketing agreement, entered into pursuant to section 8 (b) of this title, which regulates the handling of such commodity.

Mr. BYRD. Is the Senator reading at the bottom of page 20?

Mr. SMITH. At the bottom of the page.

Mr. BYRD. The section reads in this way:

> (8) Except as provided in subsection (9) of this section, no order issued pursuant to this section shall become effective until the handlers (excluding cooperative associations of producers who are not engaged in processing, distributing, or shipping the commodity or product thereof covered by such order) of not less than 50 percent of the volume of the commodity or product thereof. * * *

Mr. SMITH. The Senator has mistaken the purpose of this section. This is the provision for the elimination of the licensing feature and is a proposal for the issuance of orders to regulate the commodity in its interstate movement, and it provides that before such an order can issue the designated number of those engaged in the industry shall sign.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator has suggested that no restrictions may be put upon the producers without their consent, and the bill provides that the orders referred to, which, in my judgment, are just the same as licenses, whereby the amount of a commodity to be produced and the markets to which it is to be shipped may be restricted, and even the price fixed, can be imposed by 50 percent of the handlers.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no; that is based upon the previous consent of the producers.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator show me where provision is made for such consent?

Mr. SMITH. It is provided in every section of the bill.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator show me one section in which it is provided?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the proportion runs from two-thirds down to 50 percent. The Senator knows it is in practically every paragraph in the bill.

Mr. BYRD. It is only provided in the event that 50 percent of the handlers do not oppose the orders, then 75 percent of the growers may act. My contention is that it should originate with the producers themselves.

Mr. SMITH. It does originate with the producers.

Mr. BYRD. Will the Senator show me the specific provision under which it would originate with the producers?

Mr. SMITH. All the agreements and all the orders issued under the bill are based on the previous marketing agreements of the producers. The Senator knows that to be so. Every single order that is going to be issued to control a handler or a processor is dependent entirely upon whether or not a previous marketing agreement for the particular commodity has been entered into by the producers.

Mr. BYRD. Marketing agreements can be made with the approval of 50 percent of the handlers and without the approval of 75 percent of the producers.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. BYRD. Would the Senator mind showing the specific provision where such approval is provided for?

Mr. SMITH. I thought the Senator was sufficiently familiar with the bill and I thought I would be sufficiently familiar with it to give the specific language; but I state here and now that, with one exception, there can be no order issued to any processor, except and unless it is based upon a marketing agreement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand this bill, it provides for various amendments to the existing law. It is not an original, new bill. It is an amendment of existing law, as I understand, and the existing law provides that all the producers shall enter into a marketing agreement previous to the consummation of any of the provisions in any of the amendments. So, even though the provision is not contained in the amendment now under consideration, my understanding is that the original law makes the provision.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the original law makes the provision.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have studied the matter very carefully, and I differ from both the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY]. I ask the Senator from South Carolina to point to a specific provision whereby 75 percent of the producers must agree before the restrictions are placed upon them.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I did not say 75 percent. There are provisions whereby 75 percent are required to agree. There are other provisions where a majority only is required. The proponents of the bill, those who drafted the bill, were so careful that they took into consideration the fact that a majority of the producers might sometimes represent less than a majority of the product provided for in several sections of the bill, and therefore they included both.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Senator said the proponents of the bill, those who drafted the bill, made that arrangement.

Mr. SMITH. I meant these amendments.

Mr. GORE. Will the Senator indicate who drafted the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I wish I knew.

Mr. GORE. I understand.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I do not wish to insist upon an answer by the Senator from South Carolina——

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I will have those provisions segregated, and I will read them into the RECORD, since the Senator has raised the question. I will refer to the different specific provisions in the original act and in this amendatory bill, showing that all the amendments are predicated upon matters contained in the original act.

Mr. BYRD. I should like to have the Senator show that.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I will have them put in at the proper place. I have requested my clerk to prepare them.

Mr. President, in the consideration of both the House text and the Senate committee amendments, I hope we shall keep in mind the essential fact that this is an effort on the part of the Agricultural Department—and I hope on the part of the Senate—to do for the farmer what from time immemorial he has been unable to do for himself; and that is the only reason why I have given my consent to the guarantee provision of the bill.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. Merely for the sake of clarity and understanding, I desire to ask the Senator if it be true that the provision of the pending bill relating to orders altogether supplements the previous law relating to licenses. Those provisions are all repealed.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the Senator called my attention to that matter. After the decision of the Supreme Court, which was based upon the fact that we had delegated legislative power with a roving commission to the Agricultural Department, according to the agreement of the committee—and the Senator will bear me out in this—we read every line and every paragraph of this bill, and the chairman of the committee asked the members of the committee, "Have you any comments to make? Have you any amendments to offer?" When those matters were completed, the question was asked, "Are you ready to vote?" Is that not correct?

Mr. HATCH. That is entirely correct. I will say that the chairman of the committee was very careful to bring about that condition and labored very diligently to see that each member of the committee understood every word of the bill. If they did not, it is not his fault.

Mr. SMITH. Permit me to say, Mr. President, that I have been Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry since the present administration came into office, and I have been chairman of other committees in other administrations; and I have never before had reason or occasion for reading every line and every paragraph of a bill and insisting that every member of the committee should be present at committee meetings. The committee at all its meetings had an overwhelming majority of the members present, so that every member of the committee who is now on the floor of the Senate, or who may be here later, is thoroughly familiar with the purpose of the amendments and of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Were all the members of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry present when wool and mohair were inserted in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I think they were; and I think a member of the committee representing the section where wool and mohair originate is the author of that provision, and the one who had that provision placed in the bill.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I understand that to be so. I also understand, however, that there was no consideration whatever of it, and no discussion of it. I will ask the Senator if there was any discussion of it in the committee.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I may throw a little light on the question of wool and mohair, because I know many Senators are interested in the question.

At the request of Mr. Byron Wilson, I suggested to the committee that the question of wool and mohair be taken up. We discussed it very little. I think I made a statement that the wool people were not at all in accord with the amendment, and the committee decided to include it, with the statement that on the floor of the Senate, Senators interested in wool and mohair could accept the amendment or reject it, as they desired. There was really no careful discussion of the question, I will say to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. I thank the Senator. We can shorten the discussion a great deal by accepting the information furnished by the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and I think the same thing may apply to hops.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. May I ask why the provision in the House bill, "and not including fruits for canning" was stricken out?

Mr. SMITH. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. GEORGE. Page 11, subsection (2), "Commodities to which applicable".

Mr. SMITH. The Senator refers to the words, "and not including fruits for canning"?

Mr. GEORGE. "Not including fruits for canning." The committee amendment includes canners of fruits, but it does not include canners of vegetables. I should like to understand the reason for it.

Mr. KING. Why not strike them all out?

Mr. SMITH. The committee at great length discussed the question of fruits for canning. It was stated that the market for fruits was very often dependent upon the amount used for canning purposes, and therefore, if the canners should be exempted from these marketing agreements, that the producers of fruits perhaps would suffer in the matter of their market just as though they had no agreement at all.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator state who asked that that language be stricken out, or who made the request of the committee?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, that was committee action. There were members of the committee who represented the fruit regions, and after discussion for days I think that action was taken.

Mr. GEORGE. I broaden my inquiry, and ask all members of the committee, then, why that was stricken out. I should like to know why.

Mr. SMITH. We have on the committee members from the fruit-producing sections, and they contended that such a vast amount of fruit was canned, that if such fruit were left out the market price of the fruit would be disastrously affected, in that perhaps the major portion of the crop would be at the mercy of those who canned fruit.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is familiar with the facts. In the southern market the one supporting element of green fruits is the canner, on whom the grower can always fall back for a stable price. If fruits for canning are to be subject to the orders of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, why not vegetables for canning? Is there any essential difference?

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. MURPHY. My recollection of the discussion in the committee on the subject of excluding vegetables for canning is that it is hoped the effect of the inclusion of vegetables will be to increase the price of vegetables by bringing them under regulations in connection with directing their flow to market. By increasing the price of fresh vegetables the price of vegetables for canning is increased, because the price of the vegetables for canning is what is known as the "spot" price. It is not a price agreed upon in advance, when the contract is made with the grower of the vegetables for delivery at a given time.

Mr. GEORGE. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that he is hardly correct when he applies it all to price under contract. In many sections of the country vegetables are grown on contract just as are fruits.

Mr. MURPHY. With an agreed price.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; or else they could not be grown.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not insist that my information is correct; but, nevertheless, it is my information that the price of vegetables for canning is the "spot" price, not settled upon in advance when the contract is made. The agreement is as to acreage or production, it being impossible to determine so far in advance what the price is likely to be when the crop is ripe and ready for canning.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I may say to the Senator from Georgia it is my intention to endeavor to amend the clause which reads "vegetables (not including vegetables for canning)" by placing under the law asparagus. That is one particular vegetable as to which the producers in my locality have made the request and are very earnest in their desire.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH. I yield first to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Let me suggest to Senators that I think the question we are now discussing is one of considerable importance upon which there will be various opinions expressed. It will come up when we proceed further with the bill and amendments are offered. Would it not result in a saving of time if the discussion of the details as to fruits and vegetables and their canning, whether they should be included or not included, should await the offering of amendments which will undoubtedly be presented as we proceed with the bill? This particular item is quite a distance further on in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I want to accommodate myself to the will of the Senate. I thought it might be best for us to consider the committee amendments and then take up whatever amendments are to be proposed or whatever amendments may suggest themselves as we go along. That procedure would not estop any Senator from seeking to reject a committee amendment or to move to amend the bill otherwise. I would prefer to go ahead with the committee amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. This question comes up on agreeing or not agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. We have not reached it as yet.

Mr. SMITH. No; it has not as yet been reached.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill eliminates fruits for canning.

Mr. NORRIS. But we have not reached that amendment in the bill as yet.

Mr. FLETCHER. I know we have not, but I am suggesting that the committee amendment will involve the whole question, and I certainly shall insist that the committee amendment be rejected.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, we will discuss the amendments as we reach them in the regular order.

Mr. KING and Mr. GEORGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and, if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH. I yield first to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. As the Senator from South Carolina knows, most of the Members of the Senate are not members of his committee, and all of us have other duties of more or less importance which keep us from the floor of the Senate; but some of us would like to know just what changes have been made in the present law by the pending bill. I should be very glad—and I hope that I voice the sentiments of other Senators—to have the Senator take his time to explain to us every change that has been made in the present law, and the changes which have been made in the House bill, but particularly the former. I should like to know wherein we have amplified or changed existing law.

Mr. SMITH. I think I can say, almost in a sentence, that the existing law is not materially changed at all. I think that there is merely a substitution of language wherever it was found, in the opinion of those who drafted the amendments, that the law happened to run counter to the decision of the Supreme Court in the N. R. A. case. They accommodated themselves to that fact, and arranged the bill so that the provisions which are before the Senate, so far as they were able to do so, are made to conform to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not want to disagree at all with my friend, whom I love, but I must be permitted to say that I hastily read the bill last night, and of all the subtle, misleading, nonunderstandable language that can be found in a measure, it seems to me we find it in the bill which is before us.

I do not agree with the Senator—but probably he is right and I am wrong—that it does not change existing law. I think that it does; I think that it seeks a complete regimentation of the American producers and the American handlers, so-called, with respect to all the commodities which are embraced within the measure. I think it is a scheme for the purpose of nullifying the rights of individuals and subjecting them to a process of regimentation which will, in the end, be most offensive and destructive to individual liberty.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah a question?

Mr. KING. I have not the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to know if the Senator from Utah did not express exactly the same views when the original bill was passed?

Mr. KING. I hope that I did; and I am sure that if I did I was correct.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. Let me answer what the Senator from Utah has said as to regimentation by saying that, aside from the opinion that I voiced when I first took the floor—and I am now having my clerk mark out the places for reference—I think every member of the committee will bear out the statement I make that there is not a single instance where a control is introduced but that it is predicated upon the consent of the producer. Am I right? I am asking members of my committee.

Mr. MURPHY. I think the Senator is correct.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SMITH. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I should like to have perhaps an idle curiosity of mine gratified by making an inquiry of the Senator from South Carolina. For a long period of time there has been quite an intense crusade to bring about birth control among human beings, without success. I note here that it is proposed to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture the right to bring about birth control among bees. [Laughter.] I can understand that the drone bees, after they have had their day in court [laughter]——

Mr. SMITH. Their day at courting.

Mr. GLASS. After they have had their day in court, are said to die, so that they may be self-controlled in that way; but I should like to know just exactly how the Secretary of Agriculture proposes to control the queen bees. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I think it is very much along the line of birth control amongst individuals. So far as the bee provision is concerned, whence it came the chairman of the committee knows not, but there was a majority of the committee for it; when it was proposed to include bees and queen bees, the question was put to the committee and a majority voted to incorporate the provision. I am thoroughly unfamiliar with the bee business, but I do wish that we could pass some law that would have the same effect on the human family that there is on drone bees.

Mr. GLASS. I have a good many bees; I do not know how many of them are queens; but I am just a little curious to know how I am expected to control the queen bees. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I think that the proponent of that provision of the bill will probably have to explain it. As chairman, I plead ignorance entirely of any of the marketing agreements in reference to bees. I did hear it said that there is a peculiar queen bee known as the "Italian queen bee", which, when put into a hive, affects with an Italian flavor all the subsequent bees in that hive.

Mr. GLASS. Of course we can control the Italian queen bees by prohibiting their importation into this country.

Mr. SMITH. No; they have been here for many years; there are plenty of them here.

Mr. GLASS. They are already here?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; they are here.

Mr. GLASS. So we cannot control those that are here, but——

Mr. FLETCHER. Can we not license them?

Mr. GLASS. I should like to understand how the Secretary of Agriculture can come down to my plantation in Virginia and require me to discriminate against my queen bees. [Laughter.]

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can say to the Senator from Virginia it is my understanding that the man owning a queen bee will be furnished with a logarithm for each bee which he owns, which will solve the equation, and the owner will be able to get such logarithms on application. [Laughter.]

Mr. GLASS. That may explain it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Waiving, of course, the facetiousness of the remarks of the Senator from Virginia, permit me to say that this amendment was incorporated at the request of the bee shippers of this country. It is quite a large industry in some 6 or 8 States, and there are now bee-bargaining agreements under which the bee producers are operating and with which they are satisfied.

Of course, the facetious remarks about birth control might as well be applied to fruits or vegetables or anything else included in this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I think they might be.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The provision does not relate to anything except the matter of the orderly marketing of the shipment of package bees, queen bees, which are in demand throughout the country. A number of requests came from 6 or 8 States, and it was pointed out—and the Department of Agriculture confirmed the suggestion—that the bee owners were now operating under marketing agreements and merely wanted to preserve what they have.

Mr. GLASS. I am not facetious about it; I am serious about it. I do not want to be fined and put in jail because I just cannot control the actions of my queen bees. [Laughter.] Therefore I want to know what is the meaning of it. I cannot conceive how the Secretary of Agriculture can control my queen bees. [Laughter.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the Senator is not facetious about it, I should like to have him point out anything in the bill that indicates any effort of control along the line he is talking about.

Mr. GLASS. This section of the bill does.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It relates to marketing agreements.

Mr. GLASS. I know, but it controls my queen bees or at least it is designed to control them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is designed to control their shipment.

Mr. GLASS. Well, that means production and shipment of queen bees. Nobody is going to overproduce queen bees and keep them in his hive; he will want to ship them. I just want to know how the Secretary of Agriculture is going to handle it.

Mr. SMITH. I think the request of those who produce bees for the market is responsible for the provision, but I am thoroughly unfamiliar with the facts. It is, however, rather complimentary to the effort on the part of the Agricultural Department to improve the process wherever bees are produced for the market. I never before heard of "package bees" until the question came before the committee, nor of the propagation of queen bees for market; but if the States engage in the production of bees for market and of queen bees for the propagation of particular productive honey-making bees, recognize that there is some benefit in the marketing agreements, and ask to come under them, it is more complimentary than it is destructively critical of the bill.

I do not know anything about the production of bees for markets—"package bees", as they are called—nor do I know anything about the production of queen bees. If there are Members of the Senate who are familiar with the subject it would seem to me to be their duty to explain it to the Senate. It was not fully explained to the committee except through the medium of letters and communications which seemed to indicate it is an industry which ought to be under the regulations proposed on the theory that the bee producers are already operating under a marketing agreement relating to bees.

Personally I have no use for the bee, because he is a very active "bird" with which I am not very much inclined to be friendly, and, too, I am not very fond of honey. I was rather amazed to learn that there is an industry involving the shipment of bees.

If under marketing agreements the bee producers can be benefited and any Senator is familiar with the raising and marketing of bees, I should be glad to have an explanation. In the committee all we knew about it was that they were under a marketing agreement now and wanted to be included in the bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I for one should like to see the bill amended to make the Secretary of Agriculture the handler of these bees. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH. I should not object! [Laughter.]

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I say in that connection that in the production of honey it is not so much the kind of bees as it is the kind of flowers. We have in Florida the tupelo tree flower. Tupelo honey is the only honey produced in the world that does not coagulate or turn to sugar.

Mr. SMITH. Perhaps the bill should be so worded as to require the furnishing of tupelo flowers for the bees?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; the thing to do is to furnish the bees with the proper kind of flowers.

Mr. SMITH. That may be developed later.

Mr. President, may we have the next amendment stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 9, line 20, after the word "and", to strike out the word "others" and the comma and insert the word "others", and in line 22, after the word "thereof", to insert the word "only", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 4. Subsection (2) of section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by designating said subsection as section 8b, by inserting said section at the end of section 8a, and by amending the first sentence thereof to read as follows: "In order to effectuate the declared policy of this title, the Secretary of Agriculture shall have the power, after due notice and opportunity for hearing, to enter into marketing agreements with processors, producers, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, only in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or so as directly to burden, obstruct, or affect, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 8, after the word "and", to strike out the word "others" and the comma and insert "others"; and in line 12, after the word "provided", to strike out "the handling of such agricultural commodity, or product thereof, only in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or so as directly to burden, obstruct, or affect, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof", and to insert in lieu thereof "only such handling of such agricultural commodity, or product thereof, as is in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or as directly burdens, obstructs, or affects, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 8c. (1) The Secretary of Agriculture shall, subject to the provisions of this section, issue, and from time to time amend, orders applicable to processors, associations of producers, and others engaged in the handling of any agricultural commodity or product thereof specified in subsection (2) of this section. Such persons are referred to in this title as 'handlers.' Such orders shall regulate, in the manner hereinafter in this section provided, only such handling of such agricultural commodity, or product thereof, as is in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or as directly burdens, obstructs, or affects, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, a number of Senators now absent are interested in this particular section. Therefore, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, first let me ask the Senator in charge of the bill about the next amendment, in the provision headed "Commodities to which applicable." That provision is largely the heart of the bill. May it not be passed over until tomorrow? I should not want action taken on it today. It treats of the various commodities which have been included under the marketing-agreement provision. Very little time has been given to members to study the bill. This is a very important section, and I should like to have an understanding with the chairman of the committee that it shall be passed over until tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, so far as the chairman of the committee is concerned, that is perfectly agreeable. I do not think we ought to go through the bill hastily. I hope all Senators will study the bill in relation to the particular benefit the farmer is to derive. There will be plenty of fight here on the part of those whose age-old rights are to be interfered with. I beg of my colleagues to think of the man who all these years has had no say whatever with reference to the price of the commodity he produces.

So far as I am concerned, I am willing that the amendment shall go over if that meets with the approval of the other Members of the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. I ask unanimous consent that consideration of the amendments covered by the section entitled "Commodities to which applicable", beginning at the bottom of page 10, may be passed over for the day.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, that should be enlarged to include all the amendments down to the bottom of page 29, because they all relate to the marketing agreements.

Mr. McNARY. I had particular reference to the commodities specified in this section. I am very willing that the entire provision shall go over.

Mr. BYRD. It is all interlocking down to and including page 29.

Mr. McNARY. I enlarge my request to include the provisions suggested by the able Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that the proposal of the Senator from Oregon includes all those things which would come under the orders which have been substituted for licensing. There is a distinction in the bill between the basic crops upon which the processing tax has been laid and which do not come in this category at all. These commodities are the ones which are proposed to be subject to order. I hope every Member of the Senate who is interested in the legislation will bear in mind that every provision subject to these orders relates to interstate commerce. Provision is made in the bill whereby intrastate commodities may be included by coordinating or cooperating with the interstate or Federal forces in bringing about the condition which is desired on the part of the States only in cooperation with the Federal Government.

I desired to make that statement because my attention has been called to certain language in the bill which, detached from the preceding language, looks as though we had gone within the States on these matters, as was done in the case of licensing. That is the language which means it may be done only with the consent and cooperation of the States.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have action upon my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. SMITH. Let me understand thoroughly the request submitted. I understand it to include all provisions down to and including page 29, all of it being related matter?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The request covers all of section 5. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 36, line 24, after the word "paragraph", to strike out "(6)" and insert "(8)"; and on page 37, line 5, after the word "on", to strike out "June 1, 1935, during the period from the date of the adoption of this amendment" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "the date of the adoption of this amendment, during the period from such date", so as to make the paragraph read:

"SPECIFIC TAX RATES

"(2) In the case of wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, peanuts, tobacco, paper, and jute, and (except as provided in paragraph (8) of this subsection) in the case of sugarcane and sugar beets, the tax on the first domestic processing of the commodity generally or for any particular use, or in the production of any designated product for any designated use, shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid at the rate prescribed by the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in effect on the date of the adoption of this amendment, during the period from such date to December 31, 1937, both dates inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 13, to insert the following new paragraph:

"SPECIFIC TAX RATE—MARKETING YEAR—FLOOR STOCKS—RYE

"(4) For the period from August 1, 1935, to December 1, 1937, both inclusive, the processing tax with respect to rye shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid at the rate of 30 cents per bushel of 56 pounds. In the case of rye, the first marketing year shall be considered to be the period commencing August 1, 1935, and ending June 30, 1936. Subsequent marketing years shall commence on July 1 and end on June 30 of the succeeding year. The provisions of section 16 of this title shall not apply in the case of rye.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What was that amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be restated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 37, after line 13, it is proposed to insert a subhead, "Specific tax rate—Marketing year—Floor stocks—Rye", and certain other words.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 38, to insert:

"SPECIFIC TAX RATE—FLOOR STOCKS—FLAXSEED AND BARLEY

"(5) If at any time prior to December 31, 1937, any tax with respect to flaxseed, or barley becomes effective pursuant to proclamation as provided in subsection (a) of this section, such tax shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid during the period from the date upon which such tax becomes effective to December 31, 1937, both inclusive, in the case of flaxseed at the rate of 35 cents per bushel of 56 pounds, and in the case of barley at the rate of 25 cents per bushel of 48 pounds. The provisions of section 16 of this title shall not apply in the case of flaxseed and barley.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment may go over for the moment. Will the chairman of the committee allow it to be taken up a little later? I have various protests from my State about this provision as to flaxseed, and I should like to bring them to the attention of the committee.

Mr. SMITH. Where a Senator has certain amendments which he desires to offer, I think it is proper to give him the opportunity to do so. Therefore I join in the suggestion that we pass over the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent that the amendment on page 38, lines 1 to 13, inclusive, go over at this time. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Adjustment of rate", on page 38, after line 14, to strike out:

"(4) In accordance with the formulae and standards prescribed in this title, (A) any rate of tax prescribed in paragraphs (2) and (3) of this subsection may be decreased (including a decrease to zero), to prevent an accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or the products thereof, to prevent such reduction in the quantity of the commodity or products thereof domestically consumed as will result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of the commodity or products thereof, or to prevent depression in the farm price of the commodity, or may be increased, or shall terminate pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) or pursuant to section 13, and (B) after December 31, 1937 (in the case of the commodities specified in paragraph (2) of this subsection), and after July 31, 1936 (in the case of rice), rates of tax shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture and shall thereafter be effective. If the applicability to any person or circumstances of any tax under this title the rate of which is fixed in pursuance of this paragraph is finally held invalid by reason of any provision of the Constitution, or is finally held invalid by reason of the Secretary of Agriculture's exercise or failure to exercise any power conferred on him under this title, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (in lieu of all rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph with respect to all tax liabilities incurred under this title on or after the effective date of each of the rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph, respectively) rates of tax fixed under paragraph (2) or (3) and such rates shall be in effect (unless the particular tax is terminated pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) or pursuant to section 13) until altered by act of Congress; except that, for any period prior to the effective date of such holding of invalidity, the amount of tax which represents the difference between tax at the rate fixed in pursuance of this paragraph and tax at the rate fixed under paragraph (2) or (3) shall not be levied, assessed, collected, or paid.

And to insert:

"(6) (A) Any rate of tax which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection on the processing of any commodity, shall be decreased (including a decrease to zero) in accordance with the formulae, standards, and requirements of paragraph (1) of this subsection, in order to prevent such reduction in the quantity of such commodity or the products thereof domestically consumed as will result in the accumulation of surplus stocks of such commodity or the products thereof or in the depression of the farm price of the commodity.

"(B) If the average farm price of any commodity, the rate of tax on the processing of which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection, during the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year—

"(i) is equal to, or exceeds by 20 percent or less, the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 20 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

"(ii) exceeds by more than 20 percent the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced, at the beginning of the next succeeding marketing year, to such rate as equals 10 percent of the fair exchange value thereof.

"(C) Any rate of tax which has been decreased pursuant to this paragraph (6) shall remain at such decreased rate until further decreased pursuant to this paragraph (6), or until increased pursuant to this paragraph (6) or paragraph (1) of this subsection.

"(D) In accordance with the formulae, standards, and requirements prescribed in this title, any rate of tax prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection may be increased.

"(E) Any tax, the rate of which is prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), and (5) of this subsection, shall terminate pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) of this title or pursuant to section 13 of this title. Any such tax with respect to any basic commodity which terminates pursuant to proclamation as provided in section 9 (a) of this title shall again become effective at the rate prescribed in paragraphs (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection from the beginning of the marketing year for such commodity next following the date of a new proclamation by the Secretary as provided in section 9 (a) of this title, if such marketing year begins prior to December 31, 1937, and shall remain at such rate until altered pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of this title.

"(F) After December 31, 1937 (in the case of the commodities specified in paragraphs (2), (4), and (5) of this subsection), and after July 31, 1936 (in the case of rice), rates of tax shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the formulae, standards, and requirements prescribed in this title, and shall, subject to such formulae, standards, and requirements, thereafter be effective.

"(G) If the applicability to any person or circumstances of any tax, the rate of which is fixed in pursuance of this paragraph (6), is finally held invalid by reason of any provision of the Constitution, or is finally held invalid by reason of the Secretary of Agriculture's exercise or failure to exercise any power conferred on him under this title, there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (in lieu of all rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph (6) with respect to all tax liabilities incurred under this title on or after the effective date of each of the rates of tax fixed in pursuance of this paragraph (6)), rates of tax fixed under paragraphs (2), (3), (4), or (5), and such rates shall be in effect (unless the particular tax is terminated pursuant to proclamation, as provided in section 9 (a) or pursuant to section 13) until altered by act of Congress; except that, for any period prior to the effective date of such holding of invalidity, the amount of tax which represents the difference between the tax at the rate fixed under paragraphs (2), (3), (4), and (5) shall not be levied, assessed, collected, or paid.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this has all the appearance of being a very complex provision. It is inserted in lieu of the provision incorporated in the House bill. I should like to have, and I suggest that the chairman make, an ample explanation of the reasons which brought about the change.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, this amendment has to do with the parity price and the processing tax. The tax ostensibly is levied for the purpose of collecting from the processor a sufficient amount to produce, when returned to the producer, what is known as the "parity price." The purchasing power of the farm dollar is sought to be raised to an equality with that of the dollar of industry. Under this provision several of us maintain that in spite of what objection may have been made to the processing tax, once it is laid, and the processor and the producer cooperate, or for whatever reason the price to the producer is raised to the parity price, it is unfair still to lay and collect the tax.

Provision is made here that when the price has reached parity, and goes as much as 20 percent above it, the processing tax shall be reduced to 20 percent or less. If during a marketing year the processing tax should be reduced, as indicated in the amendment, to zero, and the price of the commodity then should drop down, it would be impossible to impose the tax without a provision of this kind being made if it had been entirely discontinued.

I discussed that question with the Department. I maintained that when the parity price was reached the processing tax ought automatically to cease. If the object of the processing tax was to bring the price to parity, when it got to parity the processing tax should cease. My attention, however, was called to the fact that during a marketing year the price might reach parity, but, without a guaranty that it would stay there, the price might slump to a point where the producer would be entirely deprived of any chance of getting his parity price; but provision is made here that if the conditions of the price and the prospect of operation of the law of supply and demand are evident before the next marketing year comes in, by proclamation the tax is to be eliminated.

The object of this entire amendment is so to accommodate the processing tax so that when conditions preceding the next marketing year indicate that the price will be parity or above, by proclamation the processing tax may be discontinued and removed, and may be reduced during a marketing year, if the price shall reach parity and above, during the period when it reaches parity or above.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, this seems to be a rather complicated section. I have not had time to study it carefully; and I should like to ask if the Senator from South Carolina will not let it go over.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I am afraid that if we continue making exceptions we might just as well let Senators take the bill and prepare themselves to consider it tomorrow.

I do not wish to prevent anyone from having a thorough knowledge of the bill; but I am thoroughly familiar with the processing tax. I did not agree to it when it first was offered, and never have thought it was a correct principle. It is here, however; and where the processors and the producers have combined and the price has reached parity, I do not think it is proper for us to maintain the tax continuously and fully.

This provision is written for the purpose of reducing the tax during a marketing year in proportion as the price has reached parity and above, and when the conditions in the next succeeding marketing year are such as to indicate that the price will be parity and above, to remove the processing tax entirely.

That is all there is in the provision.

Mr. GERRY. Do I understand the Senator to say that in that case the tax is not to be raised?

Mr. SMITH. No; it is to be lowered whenever the price reaches parity and above, even during a marketing year. The processing tax is to be reduced even to 20 percent of the original amount, and may go lower.

Mr. GERRY. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. That is all this paragraph means, and if in a succeeding year there is an indication that through supply and demand, or by the price current, the price is likely to be parity or above, no processing tax will be laid at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment beginning on page 38, line 15.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 43, line 5, to strike out "(5)" and insert in lieu thereof "(7)", so as to read:

"RICE—SPECIAL RULE

"(7) In the case of rice, the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to a processor, except that, where the producer processes his own rice, the weight to which the rate of tax shall be applied shall be the weight of rough rice when delivered to the place of processing.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 43, line 12, to strike out "(6)" and to insert in lieu thereof "(8)"; on line 19, after the word "paragraph", to strike out "(4)" and insert in lieu thereof "(6)"; on page 44, line 4, after the word "paragraph", to strike out "(4)" and to insert in lieu thereof "(6)", so as to read:

"SUGAR—SPECIAL RULE

"(8) In the case of sugar beets or sugarcane the rate of tax shall be applied to the direct-consumption sugar, resulting from the first domestic processing, translated into terms of pounds of raw value according to regulations to be issued by the Secretary of Agriculture, and in the event that the Secretary increases or decreases the rate of tax fixed by paragraph (2) of this subsection, pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (6) of this subsection, then the rate of tax to be so applied shall be the higher of the two following quotients: The difference between the current average farm price and the fair exchange value (A) of a ton of sugar beets and (B) of a ton of sugarcane, divided in the case of each commodity by the average extraction therefrom of sugar in terms of pounds of raw value (which average extraction shall be determined from available statistics of the Department of Agriculture); the rate of tax fixed by paragraph (2) of this subsection or adjusted pursuant to the provisions of paragraph (6) of this subsection shall in no event exceed the amount of the reduction by the President on a pound of sugar raw value of the rate of duty in effect on January 1, 1934, under paragraph 501 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as adjusted to the treaty of commercial reciprocity concluded between the United States and the Republic of Cuba on December 11, 1902, and/or the provisions of the act of December 17, 1903, chapter 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 45, to insert after line 16 a new section to read as follows:

SEC. 15. Section 9 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(g) There shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid (during any period after the date of the adoption of this amendment when a processing tax is in effect with respect to cotton) a processing tax on the first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn, at the rate of 125 percent of the per pound rate of the processing tax which is then in effect on cotton.

"(1) The tax shall be measured by the yield in pounds of finished rayon or other synthetic yarn.

"(2) The term 'first domestic processing of any material which results in the production of rayon or other synthetic yarn' means that amount and degree of manufacturing or other processing of such material from the spinnerette up to the point where the rayon or other synthetic yarn is in form either to be packaged and sold as such, or to be used in further manufacturing or other processing.

"(3) The term 'rayon or other synthetic yarn' means yarn suitable for commercial winding of a denier size exceeding 112 deniers. The term 'rayon yarn' shall not be deemed to include rayon ropes of more than 500 filaments.

"(4) The provisions of paragraph (1) of subsection (a) of section 16 shall not apply in the case of rayon or other synthetic yarn, or the products thereof."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment on page 45, section 15, relating to rayon, may go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I did not hear the request.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator in charge of the bill that I have asked that the rayon amendment go over.

Mr. SMITH. The amendment relating to the processing tax on rayon?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; I desire to have that go over for the day.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, having agreed that others might go over, I shall not object to the request of the Senator, but I wish to call attention to the fact that when the processing tax is placed upon any article it is presupposed that a compensatory tax will be placed upon any article likely to afford disastrous competition.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will permit me, I am not arguing the amendment, I am merely asking that it may go over until we can get our papers together and have a little argument about it. I am not now prepared to do that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask him to state a little more fully what he meant regarding a compensatory tax? As I understand, rayon is in competition with silk.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it is very much in competition with silk. Would it not be proper to put a compensatory tax on silk if we are to put a processing tax on rayon? We can put a tax on silk whether we produce it or not.

Mr. SMITH. Rayon is more a competitor of mercerized cotton, indeed it is largely composed of cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. But a great deal of cotton is used in its production.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Tennessee address the Chair so that we may all hear what is going on?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am sorry I speak in so low a tone that the Senator cannot hear, but I cannot look at the Chair and look at the Senator from South Carolina at the same time, because they are in opposite directions.

Mr. McNARY. The Chair has a privileged status. Permit me to ask a question. Request has been made by the Senator from New York that the provision relating to rayon may go over.

Mr. SMITH. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. McNARY. May we not have that understanding?

Mr. SMITH. But I should like to have the statement of the Senator from Tennessee, because that question has arisen, not only in the committee but since the committee has reported the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me that if a processing tax is to be placed upon the greatest competitor silk has, a compensatory tax ought to be placed on silk so as to do the right thing. Rayon producers use very large quantities of low-grade cotton, commonly known as "linters." As the Senator knows, cotton is first reduced to a liquid form and then there is a process of compression by steam machinery. After cotton and wood pulp together are put into liquid form, the mixture is put under terrific pressure through steam machinery, operating on the same principle as the inside of a silkworm, and when the liquid cotton comes out it is immediately "fiberized", if I may so express it, and becomes a yarn similar to the yarn that comes from the silkworm.

Of course, the one is competitive with the other, and if we put a processing tax on the rayon we ought to put an equalizing tax on the silk, it seems to me, and I hope the Senator will not oppose an amendment to that effect.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that there is an interrelation between the prices of rayon and silk, and whether or not there is not very definite and vigorous competition between those two commodities?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely.

Mr. WAGNER. I think it is conceded, unless the Senator knows to the contrary, that there is practically no competition between rayon and cotton. I understand that the production of rayon is less than 5 percent of the production of cotton.

Mr. SMITH. I do not doubt that. Stating that the production of rayon is 5 percent of the production of cotton does not tell the story at all. The question is, What percentage of rayon is converted into clothing and furnishings, as compared with cotton?

It must be remembered that we furnish 55 percent of all the cotton produced in the world, but in this country we consume less than half of our cotton production. I think I could show the Senator some articles produced from rayon that not only are competing with cotton-made goods, but in a way are driving cotton out of the market.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I realize I am not as familiar with this subject as is the Senator from South Carolina, but I know something about the competitive conditions between rayon and silk because of my experience in connection with an effort to adjust some labor strikes in the different industries. As I recall, there was never any suggestion that there was any real competition between cotton and rayon, but there is a very definite competition between silk and rayon, and if we impose a compensatory tax upon rayon we are going simply to give the Japanese manufacturers of silk the entire American market.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to state that if, in the opinion of a majority of the Senators, the question of silk competition with rayon is of sufficient importance to justify our protecting rayon from competition with silk, there ought to be a tax on silk.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMITH. My idea all along was that silk—the worm product—was of such a distinct quality, character, and class that, though the rayon may in appearance be a substitute for it, in quality and in durability it does not even approximate it. In weight per volume it is no competitor whatever with silk. But it is not only a competitor with cotton but about three-fourths of it is cotton. It is made into cellophane and then spun out and made into silk.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wish to say that the rayon factories are very large purchasers of what we in the South know as "linters", which is the cotton fiber taken off the seed after it is ginned. It was just a short time ago when the price of linters, if my recollection serves me correctly, was down to about one-half or three-quarters of a cent a pound. Because of the increased use of linters, largely by reason of the demand on account of its use in rayon, linters now bring about 5½ cents, as I recall. It is a matter of the utmost importance that, so far as possible, that market should be sustained. Certainly we should not destroy it by legislation, and it seems to me for that reason there ought to be a compensatory tax.

Mr. SMITH. I think we ought to put into the RECORD the fact that linters, strange and paradoxical as it may seem, come in competition with the farmer's cotton, for the linters are procured by the cottonseed-oil producers; they are a by-product out of which they get a profit to the detriment of the farmer. It is really a competitor of the farmer's own product. Through the oil mills it is made a competitor of his product, and I am not disposed to increase the consumption of a competitor of the very thing I am trying to protect.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. May I ask the Senator whether or not the proposal for the compensatory tax upon rayon was recommended by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. SMITH. I think not. I think they were perfectly willing to accept it, but I think in justice they ought to put it on when they put the processing tax on cotton. Under our protective tariff system, every time we put a duty on an article we put a compensatory tax on every competitor. Let Senators read the tariff bill. Yet when we came to deal with the farmer domestically I did not believe in the processing tax, because it was the protective tariff domestically applied, and I protested against it; but provision was made for it. If we are to apply it, let us apply it as we do the infernal protective tariff. Let us protect the article we are seeking to protect by the imposition of a compensatory tax on its competitors.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, apparently the Department which has been administering the present act—and of course has been doing it to protect cotton and to aid cotton—has not recognized that there was a competition between rayon and cotton which required the imposition of this compensatory tax. That is the reason why I asked the question, because I understand this recommendation does not come from the Department at all.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, coming as we do from the different sections of the United States, and knowing our own problems, we ought to legislate rather than to have legislation handed to us. The Senator from New York knows the conditions of his section, and I know the conditions in my section of the country.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. There are other sections of the country besides those which raise cotton.

Mr. SMITH. I was not aware of that fact!

Mr. COPELAND. I sometimes think the Senator is serious when he makes such a statement as that.

Mr. SMITH. I am glad the Senator informed me.

Mr. COPELAND. We have in this country 175,000 employees working in the rayon industry.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and about 6,000,000 engaged in producing cotton.

Mr. COPELAND. The scheme which the Senator from South Carolina has in mind will not have the sole effect of helping the cotton industry, but will also help Japanese silk.

I once more renew my request that the Senator from South Carolina let this provision go over.

Mr. SMITH. I have said all along that I am perfectly willing to have it go over, but I desired to save some time by getting something off the chests of some of the other Senators.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. The State of Virginia produces perhaps more rayon than any other State in the United States, and most of it is made from wood, not from cotton at all.

Mr. SMITH. I think the Senator will find upon investigation that the textile strength of the rayon produced in his State largely depends on the cellulose derived from cotton; and I think if the Senator will visit the rayon mills he will find that they mix the substance obtained from the wood with cotton fiber.

Mr. GLASS. The largest rayon factory in the United States is in the congressional district in which I live.

Mr. SMITH. And they do not use any cotton at all?

Mr. GLASS. I did not say that they do not use any cotton at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. They mix cotton fibers with their other ingredients.

Mr. GLASS. I did not say they do not use any cotton at all, but I do not think they should be taxed out of existence because they use a little cotton.

Mr. McKELLAR. That does not make them competitive with cotton anyway. Both linen and wood products are used in making rayon.

Mr. WAGNER. The result will be to tax them out of existence.

Mr. GLASS. Of course it will.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendment on page 45, section 15, beginning with line 17 and ending with line 20, on page 46, be laid aside for the day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was on page 46, line 21, after "Sec." to strike out "15" and insert "16"; and on page 47, line 12, after the word "distribution" to strike out the comma and "but without discrimination against other producers, processors, and handlers"; so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 16. Subsection (b) of section 10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(b) (1) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish, for the more effective administration of the functions vested in him by this title, State and local committees, or associations of producers, and to permit cooperative associations of producers, when in his judgment they are qualified to do so, to act as agents of their members and patrons in connection with the distribution of payments authorized to be made under section 8. The Secretary, in the administration of this title, shall accord such recognition and encouragement to producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations as will be in harmony with the policy toward cooperative associations set forth in existing acts of Congress, and as will tend to promote efficient methods of marketing and distribution."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator why this language is to be stricken from the bill? What is offensive about the prohibition against discrimination on page 47, line 12? The committee is striking out the words " but without discrimination against other producers, processors, and handlers ". Is it necessary to have discrimination in order to make this system work?

Mr. SMITH. No. There was considerable discussion in the committee about that language. It has reference to the cooperatives. It was found, as the Senator knows, that certain privileges are extended to the cooperatives which are not extended to other marketing agencies.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. It was supposed that the language, " but without discrimination against other producers, processors, and handlers ", would in effect be to discriminate against cooperatives.

Mr. SMITH. That is exactly the point.

Mr. BORAH. By striking out that language it was designed to leave intact whatever advantage the cooperatives had.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly. That is all it means.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is a sound doctrine.

Mr. SMITH. It was brought out in the committee that with this language in the bill no protection could be given the cooperatives, even under the law we had passed exempting them from the operation of certain laws and allowing them certain lending privileges.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, beginning in line 21, on page 46, and ending in line 13, on page 47.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, line 12, after " Sec.", to strike out " 16 " and insert " 17 ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 17. Subsection (e) of section 10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out " rental or benefit payment " and inserting in lieu thereof " payment authorized to be made under section 8."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 17, on page 48, line 16, after the word " Sec.", to strike out " 17 " and insert " 18 "; in line 19, after the word "Agriculture ", to strike out " is authorized " and insert " upon the request of the duly constituted authorities of any State is directed,"; and on page 49, line 2, after the word " State " and the comma, to insert " and is authorized ", so as to make the paragraph read:

SEC. 18. Section 10 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i) The Secretary of Agriculture upon the request of the duly constituted authorities of any State is directed, in order to effectuate the declared policy of this title and in order to obtain uniformity in the formulation, administration, and enforcement of Federal and State programs relating to the regulation of the handling of agricultural commodities or products thereof, to confer with and hold joint hearings with the duly constituted authorities of any State, and is authorized to cooperate with such authorities; to accept and utilize, with the consent of the State, such State and local officers and employees as may be necessary; to avail himself of the records and facilities of such authorities; to issue orders (subject to the provisions of section 8c) complementary to orders or other regulations issued by such authorities; and to make available to such State authorities the records and facilities of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, That information furnished to the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to section 8d (1) hereof shall be made available only to the extent that such information is relevant to transactions within the regulatory jurisdiction of such authorities, and then only upon a written agreement by such authorities that the information so furnished shall be kept confidential by them in a manner similar to that required of Federal officers and employees under the provisions of section 8d (2) hereof."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 49, after line 18, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 19. Section 11 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out the word " flax " and inserting in lieu thereof the word " flaxseed."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I should like to have that amendment go over. I am not familiar with the reason which prompted the committee to insert this language in the bill. I think I have in my files literature upon the subject to which I should like to refer.

Mr. SMITH. Is that the amendment with reference to flaxseed?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this amendment was inserted at my request. In the original bill the word " flax " was inadvertently used for " flaxseed." It is the seed we desire to have in the bill, and not the flax fiber or anything of that kind. I requested that this amendment be inserted in the bill in order that there should be no question with reference to the meaning of another amendment in the bill which applies to flaxseed.

Mr. McNARY. Would the Senator be willing to let it be passed over for the present? I shall probably agree with him, but I think I have a file dealing with the matter which is being discussed, and I should appreciate the Senator's courtesy in permitting it to be passed over, so that I may refer to the file.

Mr. FRAZIER. I have no objection to its being passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the committee amendment on page 49, lines 19 to 21, both inclusive, be passed over for the day. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 49, line 22, after " Sec.", to strike out " 18 " and insert " 20 ", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 20. The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out " rental and benefit payments made with respect to reduction in acreage or reduction in production for market under part 2 of this title " and inserting in lieu thereof " payments authorized to be made under section 8."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 50, after line 3, to strike out the following:

SEC. 9. Section 12 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Amounts expended under this title which are expended for payments authorized to be made under section 8 and administrative expenses in connection with any basic agricultural commodity shall not be less than a sum equal to the proceeds of the taxes levied under this title with respect to such commodity. For the purposes of this subsection: (1) Amounts collected and expended from taxes the proceds of which under this title are held for, or paid for use in, any possession of the United States shall not be included; (2) the amount of all refunds and abatements of taxes shall not be included; and (3) hogs and field corn may be considered as one commodity."

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question for information at this point.

It is my understanding that at the present time the processing taxes collected upon any given commodity are segregated exclusively to the payment of beneficial payments for the commodity. It is my understanding that it is now proposed to turn the processing-tax revenues into the general fund of the Treasury and to cease the guarantee that the collections for a given commodity shall be dedicated exclusively to that commodity. Am I correct?

Mr. SMITH. It is proposed to do just exactly the opposite.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the situation?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator will find further along in the bill that each commodity shall, to the cent, be the beneficiary of whatever taxes are collected, and that whatever benefit payments are made in connection with any product shall be made from the taxes collected in connection with that particular and specific product.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is the purpose of striking out this particular section?

Mr. SMITH. I think it is clarified later on in other language in the bill.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; there is no substituted language.

Mr. SMITH. The language of this particular section ran counter to the decision of the Supreme Court, and the committee eliminated it, and further on in the text there is language which does accommodate itself to the decision of the Supreme Court.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is what I should like to know about. In what aspect does the language stricken out run counter to the philosophy of the decision of the Supreme Court?

Mr. SMITH. I shall have to leave that question to some of my legal friends for explanation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan is in error in the idea he expressed that the present law requires the segregation of taxes. It does not so require at all. As a matter of practical application, it has been done. The present law, the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, makes no segregation of any kind of the specific taxes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am correct that that is the practice?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is the practice; and I assume, I will say to the Senator from Michigan, that the practice is expected to be continued. This section as it came from the House appeared to the members of the committee who are lawyers as being a provision which might be construed to be a declaration in the law of a particular tax for a special purpose. For that reason, in order to prevent any such declaration in the law, the committee decided to strike out the section and leave the law as it is now, so that all taxes collected under the processing taxes shall go into the Treasury, into the general fund made available to the Secretary of Agriculture for the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The amendment leaves the law, I repeat, as it is now.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from South Carolina subsequently said, as I understood him, that there is a provision which specifically requires all these commodity taxes to be paid to the benefit of the commodities.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This being a legal question, the Senator subsequently said that he would prefer that some of the lawyers on the committee should explain the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The original statement was in error?

Mr. BANKHEAD. The first statement was in error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment reported by the committee is agreed to. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 51, after line 23, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 23. Subsection (b) of section 15 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end of said subsection the following new sentence: "The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to exempt by regulation from the payment of the tax on the ginning of cotton as levied under authority of the act approved April 21, 1934, an amount of lint cotton not in excess of 110 pounds, produced by or for any producer and retained for domestic use in his household."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, after line 14, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 25. The first sentence of subsection (d) of section 15 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding after the word "processors" the words "or producers."

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I should like an explanation of the amendment which has just been stated and which proposes to add to the orginal act the words "or producers" after the word "processors."

Mr. SMITH. I think it has reference entirely to agreements. I have not the original act before me and therefore I cannot tell exactly what the reference is.

Mr. BYRD. I will hand the Senator a copy of the original act.

Mr. SMITH. I thank the Senator. I see, as I thought, that it has reference to the effect of the processing tax on the processors or producers. If the effect is detrimental to the processors or producers, then the remedy is as here indicated. The original act contained the words "or will cause to the processors thereof disadvantages." The words "or producers" have been added to give them a 50-50 chance. I thought I was correct in the first instance, and now I know I am. Does the Senator from Virginia object to having the producers included, so that they also may be made beneficiaries along with the processors?

Mr. BYRD. I am very glad to have the explanation of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee, to insert section 25, after line 14, on page 52.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 27, on page 53, line 10, after the word "credited", to strike out "when" and insert "(but not before"; and in line 11, after the word "been", to strike out "paid" and insert "paid)", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 27. Subsection (a) of section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by striking out subdivision (2) thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(2) Whenever the processing tax is wholly terminated, (A) there shall be refunded or credited in the case of a person holding such stocks with respect to which a tax under this title has been paid, or (B) there shall be credited or abated in the case of a person holding such stocks with respect to which a tax under this title is payable, where such person is the processor liable for the payment of such tax, or (C) there shall be refunded or credited (but not before the tax has been paid) in the case of a person holding such stocks with respect to which a tax under this title is payable, where such person is not the processor liable for the payment of such tax, a sum in an amount equivalent to the processing tax which would have been payable with respect to the commodity from which processed if the processing had occurred on such date: Provided, That in the case of any commodity with respect to which there was any increase, effective prior to June 1, 1934, in the rate of the processing tax, no such refund, credit, or abatement, shall be in an amount which exceeds the equivalent of the initial rate of the processing tax in effect with respect to such commodity."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 28, page 54, line 1, after the word "Except", to insert "as to flour processed from wheat and."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, from a hasty glance I am unable to interpret the reason for that change. What does the chairman of the committee have to say about it?

Mr. SMITH. I did not hear the Senator's statement.

Mr. McNARY. I say from a hasty glance I do not discern the reason for including that language in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. I think anyone reading the context will see exactly what it means. It is essential to have this language:

Except as to flour processed from wheat and as to any article processed wholly or in chief value from cotton, the tax refund, credit, or abatement provided in subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to the retail stocks of persons engaged in retail trade.

That means that the processing tax shall not be carried on down to the retailers; that it is a wholesale tax.

Mr. McNARY. It is a clear substitution of the product of wheat, namely, flour, for wheat itself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same section, on page 54, line 3, after the word "cotton", to insert "or wheat", and in line 6, after the word "trade", to insert "nor to any article (except sugar) processed wholly or in chief value from sugar beets, sugarcane, or any product thereof, nor to any article (except flour) processed wholly or in chief value from wheat", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 28. The second sentence of subsection (b) of section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows: "Except as to flour processed from wheat and as to any article processed wholly or in chief value from cotton the tax refund, credit, or abatement provided in subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to the retail stocks of persons engaged in retail trade, nor to any article (except sugar) processed wholly or in chief from sugar beets, sugarcane, or any product thereof, nor to any article (except flour) processed wholly or in chief value from wheat, held on the date the processing tax is wholly terminated."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. CAREY. I ask the Senator from South Carolina why is sugar excepted in the amendment which begins in line 6 on page 54?

Mr. SMITH. The manner in which sugar is manufactured and sold, in the opinion of those familiar with it, puts it in a wholly different class from cotton or wheat, because sugar is imported very often in a semimanufactured state and is refined here. So it would be difficult to impose a tax where it would do the producer the most good, the process in the case of sugar being different from that in the case of the other two commodities, which are simple in their form of manufacture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 29, line 15, after the date "1934", to strike out "and", and in line 16, after the word "hogs", to insert "; and by inserting at the end of such paragraph the following: 'In the case of wheat the provisions of this paragraph shall apply to flour only; in the case of sugarcane and sugar beets the provisions of this paragraph shall apply to sugar only.'

"(b) Section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"'(f) No refund, credit, or abatement of the amount of any tax shall be made or allowed under this section, unless, within 60 days after the right to such refund, credit, or abatement accrued, a claim for such refund, credit, or abatement (conforming to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe) is filed by the person entitled to such refund, credit, or abatement, and no such claim shall be allowed for an amount less than $10'" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 29. (a) Paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after the first word in the first sentence a comma and the following: "subsequent to June 26, 1934", by inserting in the proviso after the word "made", the following: "in the case of hogs"; and by inserting at the end of such paragraph the following: "In the case of wheat the provisions of this paragraph shall apply to flour only; in the case of sugarcane and sugar beets the provisions of this paragraph shall apply to sugar only.

(b) Section 16 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) No refund, credit, or abatement of the amount of any tax shall be made or allowed under this section, unless, within 60 days after the right to such refund, credit, or abatement accrued, a claim for such refund, credit, or abatement (conforming to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe) is filed by the person entitled to such refund, credit, or abatement, and no such claim shall be allowed for an amount less than $10."

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that the amendment on page 54, beginning in line 16, be passed over.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator mean the entire amendment or the refund provision?

Mr. CAREY. I mean the refund provision. The reason I ask that it go over is that I understand if a person were entitled to a refund and did not know it and on that account had not made application within 60 days, he would not be entitled to a refund. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; the individual has 60 days from the time of the imposition of the tax to request a refund. If he does not avail himself of that privilege within the time, he is not entitled to it.

Mr. CAREY. Presuming that the tax was erroneously collected and the payer did not know it for 60 days, he would be out of court, so to speak, and could not apply for a refund after that time, as I understand the amendment?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know how we are going to legislate except under general rules, because if we should not provide such a limitation nobody would ever know anything about it, and claims would be made after 60 days. I think that is obvious.

Mr. CAREY. I should like to have the amendment go over today.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I have to go to a conference for a few minutes. Would the Senator permit the provisions on page 58 and 59 with reference to bringing suits to go over?

Mr. SMITH. We have not reached that portion of the bill as yet.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that, but I have to be gone for a short time, and I ask the Senator if he will permit those provisions to be passed over when reached.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I understand the Senator has an amendment in reference to that portion of the bill?

Mr. BORAH. Yes, and I should like to have the provisions passed over for the time being.

Mr. SMITH. Very well, I will be perfectly willing to do that, but I hope that we will so govern ourselves as to try to get through with the very pleasant task of passing on the committee amendments. I have no objection, when we reach the provisions prohibiting suits to which the Senator from Idaho refers, to having them go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, on request of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY], the committee amendment beginning on line 21, page 54, and extending to line 7, on page 55, will be passed over.

The question is on the committee amendment in line 15, page 54, striking out the word "and"; and in line 16 on the same page, after the word "hogs", inserting down to and including the end of line 20.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the committee struck out entirely, on page 66, section 31 of the House bill as well as some of the preceding sections.

Mr. SMITH. Is that the export and import debenture clause?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask at this time to offer an amendment which seeks to restore the House language, and the motion includes a clause which was stricken out by the House committee. I want to have an agreement that I may have a vote on my amendment, though not at this time, irrespective of the parliamentary situation, because the question would naturally recur upon the committee amendment to strike out all that language, and it might be held, that language having been stricken out, I could not move to reinsert it. So I ask unanimous consent that at the proper time I may offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. SMITH. As I understand, the Senator desires to offer his amendment now and let it lie on the table until we reach the point indicated?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will lie on the table, for the time being. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, in section 30, on page 55, line 11, after the word "following", to strike out:

"The consignor named in the bill of lading under which any product (if such product or the commodity from which processed is under this title subject to tax) is exported, or the exporter of such product, if the bill of lading bears the proper disclaimer by the consignor, or the manufacturer of such product, if the bill of lading bears the proper disclaimer by the consignor and the exporter, shall be entitled, upon the exportation of such product to any foreign country (or to the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Canal Zone, or the island of Guam) to the refund of the amount of tax due and paid under this title with respect to such product so exported, or to a credit against any tax due and payable under this title of the amount of tax which would be refundable under this section with respect to such product so exported."

And in lieu thereof to insert:

"Upon the exportation to any foreign country (and/or to the Philippine Islands, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the Canal Zone, and the island of Guam) of any product processed wholly or partly from a commodity with respect to which product or commodity a tax has been paid or is payable under this title, the tax due and payable or due and paid shall be credited or refunded. Under regulations prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the credit or refund shall be allowed to the consignor named in the bill of lading under which the product is exported or to the shipper or to the person liable for the tax provided the consignor waives any claim thereto in favor of such shipper or person liable for the tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, after line 19, to insert the following new paragraph:

(b) Section 2 of the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1936, is amended by striking out the first word "The" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "Seventy-five percent of the."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 57, to insert the following new paragraph:

(c) Section 19 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(d) Under regulations made by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, any person required pursuant to the provisions of this title to file a return may be required to file such return and pay the tax shown to be due thereon to the collector of internal revenue for the district in which the processing was done or the liability was incurred. Whenever the Commissioner of Internal Revenue deems it necessary, he may require any person or class of persons handling or dealing in any commodity or product thereof, with respect to which a tax is imposed under the provisions of this title, to make a return, render under oath such statements, or to keep such records as the Commissioner deems sufficient to show whether or not such person, or any other person, is liable for the tax."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 19, to strike out the section number "29" and insert "32."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 22, after "(a)", to strike out the following:

No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector, officer, or person (nor shall any such suit or proceeding be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any such court) (1) for the recoupment, set-off, recovery, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or (2) for damages for the collection thereof.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, that is to be passed over at the request of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, what is the wish of the Senator with regard to the amendment which I offered on page 67? Does he desire to proceed with it when we reach it, or is it his desire to let it go over for the day?

Mr. SMITH. Considering the fact there are other amendments, I think it would be the proper thing to let it go over for the day, so we may have time to consider it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, to what does the amendment apply?

Mr. CONNALLY. The amendment which I offered applies only to manufactured goods.

Mr. COPELAND. It does not relate at all to the amendment to the tobacco act?

Mr. CONNALLY. It might, in the case of tobacco, give the manufacturer an opportunity to come under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator seeks to restore the export bounty on manufactured products.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator about the tobacco amendment and if there were hearings on that particular feature of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. No; we did not have any hearings. The fact is that this is practically the same provision which last year worked admirably and agreeably to both the processors and the producers. The point now is that tobacco is the one commodity which reached and exceeded parity.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Considerable interest has been manifested in the amendment which I have sent to the desk. Therefore, I ask that the amendment may be printed and lie on the table, not to be acted upon today. The Senator from South Carolina indicates his agreement with that request. Supplementing the request, I ask unanimous consent that a vote may be had on that amendment when it is reached, on page 66, regardless of whether or not committee amendments have been disposed of or otherwise.

Mr. SMITH. I think that is all right. The Senator simply wants to test whether the Senate would rather have the amendment he offers than the one the committee has reported. I should like to have that settled.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, does the amendment of the Senator from Texas bear any relation to the previous import section, on page 65, which is stricken out?

Mr. CONNALLY. No. The amendment which I offer begins on page 66, line 15, and does not undertake to restore the language stricken out in section 22, on page 65. My amendment is limited to manufactured articles. I should prefer to have it apply to the raw material as well, but there is so much opposition that I have limited it to manufactured goods.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is the import section, beginning at the bottom of page 64 and continuing over to line 14, page 66, also being passed over, or is that wholly independent of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. That is absolutely independent of my amendment. The reason why I am asking unanimous consent that I may have a vote on my amendment is that, from a parliamentary standpoint, the question would come on the committee amendment striking out paragraphs 31 and 22. I submit my request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Chair would like to be advised how far on page 59 the agreement requested by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] applies?

Mr. SMITH. Only insofar as it relates to the prohibition of collecting the tax in case the court declares it to be unconstitutional. It relates to page 57, beginning in line 19, all of page 58, and to the end of line 5 on page 59.

Mr. BORAH. That is correct. I want that all passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments referred to will be passed over. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 59, line 22, before the word "provisions", to insert the word "applicable", and after the words "provisions of" to strike out "law made applicable by section 19", and insert "law, including subsection (d) of this section", so as to make the paragraph read:

"(b) No suit, action, or proceeding (including probate, administration, receivership, and bankruptcy proceedings) shall be brought or maintained in any court if such suit, action, or proceeding is for the purpose or has the effect (1) of preventing or restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed or the amount of any penalty or interest accrued under this title on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment, or (2) of obtaining a declaratory judgment under the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act in connection with any such tax or such amount of any such interest or penalty. In probate, administration, receivership, bankruptcy, or other similar proceedings, the claim of the United States for any such tax or such amount of any such interest or penalty, in the amount assessed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shall be allowed and ordered to be paid, but the right to claim the refund or credit thereof and to maintain such claim pursuant to the applicable provisions of law, including subsection (d) of this section, may be reserved in the court's order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, line 4, after the word "agriculture", to strike out the word "and", and after the word "President" to insert the word "and"; in line 8, after the word "taxes", to insert "(together with penalties and interest with respect thereto)"; in line 12, after the word "specifically", to strike out "on May 12, 1933", and in the same line, after the word "by", to insert the word "prior", so as to make the paragraph read:

"(c) The taxes imposed under this title, as determined, prescribed, proclaimed, and made effective by the proclamations and certificates of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President and by the regulations of the Secretary with the approval of the President prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes (together with penalties and interest with respect thereto) prior to said date are hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if each such tax had been made effective and the rate thereof fixed specifically by prior act of Congress. All such taxes which have accrued and remain unpaid on the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be assessed and collected pursuant to section 19, and to the provisions of law made applicable thereby. Nothing in this section shall be construed to import illegality to any act, determination, proclamation, certificate, or regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President done or made prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 60, after line 20, to strike out the following:

"(d) No refund or credit shall be made or allowed of any amount of any tax which accrued on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment under this title (including any overpayment of such tax), unless (1) the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, (A) that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, and that he has not collected from the vendee any part of such amount, or (B) that he has repaid such amount to the producer or the ultimate purchaser of the article, and (C) in the case of hogs that such amount has not been deducted from the price paid to the producer, or (2) the claimant files with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue the written consent of such producer and ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the credit or refund. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any refund under section 15 (a), section 16, or section 17.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(d) No recovery, refund, or credit shall be made or allowed of any amount of any tax which accrued on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment (and, in case any part or application of subsection (a) of this section is held invalid, which may have heretofore accrued) under this title (including any overpayment of such tax), unless the claimant establishes to the satisfaction of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, or in the case of a judicial proceeding establishes in such proceeding, (1) that he has not included such amount in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed or of any article processed from the commodity with respect to which it was imposed, that he has not collected from the vendee any part of such amount, and that the price paid to the producer was not reduced by such amount, or (2) that he has repaid such amount to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or in case the price paid to the producer was reduced by such amount, to such producer; nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by any Federal or State court for damages for the collection thereof, unless the claimant establishes the foregoing facts, in addition to all other facts required to be established. The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15, section 16, or section 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 62, line 13, after the word "no", to strike out "refund or credit" and insert the words "refund, credit, or abatement", and in line 15, after the words "section 15", to strike out the words "section 16", so as to make the paragraph read:

"(e) No refund, credit, or abatement shall be made or allowed of the amount of any tax, under section 15, or section 17, unless, within 1 year after the right to such refund or credit has accrued, a claim for such refund or credit (conforming to such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe) is filed by the person entitled to such refund or credit, except that if the right to any such refund or credit accrued prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, then such 1-year period shall be computed from the date of this amendment. No interest shall be allowed or paid, or included in any judgment, with respect to any such claim for refund or credit.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, to strike out lines 3 to 9, both inclusive, as follows:

"(f) The provisions of section 3226, Revised Statutes, as amended, are hereby extended to apply to any suit for the recovery of any amount of any tax which accrued, on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment, under this title, and to any suit for the recovery of any amount of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax or from duplicate payments of any tax.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) The provisions of section 3226, Revised Statutes, as amended, are hereby extended to apply to any suit for the recovery of any amount of any tax, penalty, or interest, which accrued on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment (and, in case any part or application of subsection (a) of this section is held invalid, which may have heretofore accrued) under this title (whether an overpayment or otherwise), and to any suit for the recovery of any amount of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax or from duplicate payments of any tax, or any refund or credit under subsections (a) or (c) of section 15, under paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 16, or under section 17 of this title or any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, beginning at the top of page 64, to strike out:

"(g) Whenever in this title a refund of any tax is authorized to be made to any person other than the person required to pay the tax with respect to which an application for refund is made, upon statement under oath by the applicant for refund that he has no knowledge, information, or belief that such tax has not in fact been paid, then for the purpose of such refund to said applicant such tax shall be deemed to have been due from any paid by the person liable therefor. Any other provision of the law notwithstanding, the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed, without review of the fact of the payment of the tax, to certify for payment refunds authorized under this subsection in the amounts scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Whoever makes any false statement under oath in connection with applying for or securing such refund of any tax shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or both."

SEC. 30. The Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, is amended by inserting after section 21 the following:

"IMPORTS

"SEC. 22. (a) Whenever the President has reason to believe that any one or more articles are being imported or are likely to be imported into the United States under such conditions and in sufficient quantities to render ineffective or materially interfere with any program or operation undertaken under this title, he shall cause an immediate investigation to be made by the United States Tariff Commission, which shall give precedence to investigations under this subsection, to determine such facts. Such investigation shall be made after such notice and hearing and subject to such regulations as the President shall specify.

"(b) If, after such investigation and report to him of findings and recommendations made in connection therewith, the President finds the existence of such facts, he shall by order direct that the entry into the United States of such article or articles shall, for such time as may be specified by him, be permitted subject to (1) such terms and conditions, (2) such limitations on the total quantities thereof which may be imported, or (3) the payment of such compensating taxes as he finds necessary to prescribe in order that the entry of such article or articles will not render or tend to render ineffective or materially interfere with such program or operation undertaken under this title. Any compensating tax imposed under this section shall be in addition to any tax imposed under section 15 (e) and the provisions of such section shall apply thereto.

"(c) Any decision of the President as to facts under this section shall be final.

"(d) Upon information of any order of the President under subsection (b), the Secretary of the Treasury shall permit entry of any article or articles specified therein only in conformity with such order.

"(e) After investigation, report, and finding in the manner provided in the case of an original order, any order or provision thereof may be suspended or revoked by the President whenever he finds that the circumstances requiring the order or provision no longer exist, or may be modified by the President whenever he finds that changed circumstances require such modification to carry out the provisions of this section."

SEC. 31. There is authorized to be appropriated for each fiscal year an amount equal to 30 percent of the gross receipts from duties collected under the customs laws during the period January 1 to December 31, both inclusive, preceding the beginning of such fiscal year. Sums appropriated in pursuance of such authorization shall be maintained in a separate fund and shall be used by the Secretary of Agriculture only to: (1) Encourage the exportation of major agricultural commodities and products thereof by the payment of benefits in connection with the exportation thereof or of indemnities for losses incurred in connection with such exportation, (2) encourage the domestic consumption of such commodities or products by diverting them, by the payment of benefits or indemnities or by other means, from the normal channels of trade and commerce; (3) purchase or lease, on behalf of the United States, submarginal agricultural and grazing lands; and (4) finance adjustments in the quantity planted or produced for market of agricultural commodities. The amounts appropriated in pursuance of this action shall be expended for such of the above-specified purposes, and at such times, in such manner, and in such amounts as the Secretary of Agriculture finds will tend to eliminate unprofitable agricultural and grazing lands, bring about the utilization of only such lands as can be profitably utilized, increase the exportation of agricultural commodities and products thereof, and increase the domestic consumption of agricultural commodities and products thereof: Provided, That no part of the funds authorized to be appropriated by this section shall be expended pursuant to (3) or (4) hereof unless the Secretary of Agriculture determines that the expenditure of such part pursuant to clauses (1) and (2) is not necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section.

Mr. SMITH. That is the part of the bill which the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] asked to have go over.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not all of it.

Mr. SMITH. Not all of it; only section 31.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator why the committee is striking out the language beginning at the bottom of page 64 and continuing on page 65, which appears to be the authority to offset increased costs of agricultural production by increased tariffs if, as, and when it is demonstrated that the increased protection is necessary. What is the purpose in striking that out?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, we are attempting by this process to bring about a condition where we can more reasonably modify the tariff rather than increase it. Whether or not we are succeeding is another question.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not follow the Senator. Will he be more specific?

Mr. SMITH. For instance, if we are intending to raise the price in this country of certain articles, and the subsequent price invites the possibility of importation of foreign goods, we are inviting right then the imposition of the protective tariff to protect us in doing that thing which would raise the price. This bill is not written for the purpose of encouraging any higher tariffs than we have; and my idea is that if the price of our stuff here reaches a point where foreign importations may be brought in under the present tariff arrangement, we shall have then reached a price where there should be no additional taxation.

Let me illustrate: Japan is buying cotton in America today at the American price, shipping it clear around the globe, manufacturing it, shipping it back around the globe, paying the tariff, and underselling American manufacturers. I claim that if, notwithstanding American ingenuity and American skill in manufacturing goods out of cotton which grows right up at the factory walls, the manufacturers of another country can come here and buy raw cotton at the same price our mills pay for it, ship it around the globe, manufacture it, ship it back around the globe, pay the tariff, and undersell the American manufacturer, the American manufacturer ought to go out of business.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am familiar with the Senator's free-trade philosophy.

Mr. SMITH. That is not a free-trade philosophy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am familiar with the Senator's free-trade philosophy, which——

Mr. SMITH. I deny any free-trade philosophy.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Which he has consistently defended in the Senate, and I admire him for his consistency; and I am not complaining about it.

Mr. SMITH. I protest against the Senator putting me in the absurd position of a free-trader. I believe that every foreigner who has the privilege of the American market should pay a tariff equal to the tax and the expenses incidental to American manufacture; but I do not believe the Senator's party ever had the constitutional right to impose a purely protective tariff. It cannot be found in the Constitution.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I do not propose to discuss with the Senator the constitutionality of protective tariffs, which apparently has been sustained for 150 years, where many other constitutional questions are being given far less tender consideration.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; and that is one instance where the Supreme Court did not do its duty, if a case was ever brought.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The question I am raising is entirely beside the abstract argument in which the Senator and I are now engaging. I desire to know if it is not a fact that the original theory of the A. A. A. law was that when the cost of producing agricultural commodities and processing them in the United States was increased by arbitrary taxes, it was contemplated that the President should offset those arbitrary increases by compensatory taxes in the nature of protection. Was not that the original conception of the A. A. A.?

Mr. SMITH. It was not mine. I do not know what others thought about it.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not asking the Senator's personal view. The Senator was in complete disagreement with the A. A. A. in the first instance.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Therefore, when the Senator gives me his view he does not give me the view of the administration respecting the matter.

Mr. SMITH. I do not know what the view of the administration was.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What is it now?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know, and I am not concerned with the administration's view. I am concerned with the common-sense view, if you can reconcile that. [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDENBERG. Not with the administration's view.

Mr. SMITH. I say I am concerned with the common-sense view. If we are going to raise prices here and use that as an excuse still further to build up a wall that has destroyed most of us—and at last, thank God! is destroying those who built the wall—I do not think this is any time for us to incorporate here directly and expressly a provision that when prices reach a certain point, the taxes may be raised on imports to keep them out—no.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, what I wish to know is not whether we are here establishing the rule to which the Senator objects. I am asking the Senator if here we are not striking down that precise rule in the existing A. A. A. law?

Mr. SMITH. No; because in all conscience——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not talking about conscience. I am talking about the A. A. A. law. [Laughter.] They are two totally different things.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; from the Senator's standpoint, but I maintain that we have no right to provide here that when prices rise to a certain point, in order to keep outsiders from coming in we shall still further raise the duties and tariffs; no. There is plenty of room within the present tariff, in all reason. The Senator very truthfully says we discard conscience here. We have done so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may the Senator and I eliminate any argument over whether there should be the thing I am talking about? I inquire whether it is not the fact that the committee amendment striking out this language does change the tariff provisions of the existing A. A. A. law?

Mr. SMITH. I hope so.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does it or does it not?

Mr. SMITH. It may or may not.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly it may or may not, one or the other. [Laughter.] Which is it?

Mr. SMITH. I think it may not, for the reason that that is only incidental. The main purpose of this provision is to get a better price.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Never mind the reason. At the moment may I not know from the Senator, who is the Senate's expert on this subject, whether this amendment does or does not change the existing A. A. A. law in respect to compensatory tariff rates? Does it or does it not?

Mr. SMITH. It was not in the original law.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Is it in the existing law?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Then it does not change existing law.

Mr. SMITH. That is what I told the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does the Senator now say to me that there is no existing law under which the President is permitted and instructed, whenever the use of A. A. A. taxes increases the cost of production in the United States, to inquire into the matter and to adjust the differential with new compensatory taxes? Does the Senator say that does not exist?

Mr. SMITH. In reference to the A. A. A.?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. My impression now is, and I think it will be verified by reading the original act, that there is no such provision. This provision was incorporated in the House, and was very wisely struck out by our committee.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question. Did the House bill provide that imports of agricultural products might be regulated by the Department by fixing quotas over which they could not be imported?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. NORBECK. And that was struck out in the Senate committee, was it?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. NORBECK. I should like to have an explanation of that paragraph.

Mr. SMITH. I think the committee were opposed to that provision. Taken in connection with our hope of multilateral and general agreements with the nations of the earth as to our export business, it was too restrictive. There are too many quotas and too many restrictions to enable us to look forward to any healthy recovery of our export business.

Mr. NORBECK. Does not the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry think that we might be flooded with too great a quantity of imports on occasions, and that there should be a stop-gap somewhere?

Mr. SMITH. We have ample provisions now to take care of such a situation. We have the antidumping clause, the Johnson Act, and the Smoot-Hawley Law with the countervailing duties. God knows what more we would need. I do not.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator does not think there is need of anything further?

Mr. SMITH. I do not.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask permission to insert a telegram in the RECORD from Mr. W. R. Ronald, a citizen of South Dakota, who has been very active in promoting the A. A. A. as a method of assisting agriculture, and protesting against the proposed change.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MITCHELL, S. DAK., July 9, 1935.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
Washington, D. C.:

Hope you will do all possible to restore A. A. A. amendment giving Secretary authority to fix import quotas. Either this or higher tariffs necessary to protect parity prices. Please wire prospect for its approval by Senate.

W. R. RONALD,
Editor Daily Republic.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to discuss this matter a little further. Is the language on pages 64 and 65, proposed to be stricken from the bill, now the law?

Mr. SMITH. No; the Senator from Idaho [Mr. POPE] has the original text of the law and I should like to have him read in the law as it now stands the very language to which this pertains.

Mr. POPE. On page 21 of the original act is found the provision, which remains the same. It provides:

(e) During any period for which a processing tax is in effect with respect to any commodity there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon any article processed or manufactured wholly or partly from such commodity and imported into the United States or any possession thereof to which this title applies, from any foreign country or from any possession of the United States to which this title does not apply, whether imported as merchandise, or as a container of merchandise, or otherwise, a compensating tax equal to the amount of the processing tax in effect with respect to domestic processing of such commodity at the time of importation—

And so forth.

That remains the law and it has not been changed. The provision about which there has been discussion here does not appear in the original law, so it is new.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So the statement I made regarding the existing situation was correct.

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. At any rate, I was correct to that extent. The Senator from Idaho says that the committee amendment striking out this language, which seems to refer to at least a kindred type of operation, does not in any way attack the continuing existence of the original provision.

Mr. POPE. That is my understanding.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Which the Senator from South Carolina did not seem to think existed at all.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, yes. But it says here, "a tax equal to the amount of the processing tax." The language here would leave it unlimited, whereas under the original law a foreign article would pay a processing tax exactly equal to the domestic processing tax, to which nobody objected. But the Senator was asking me whether, if we raised the price here, we could still raise the tariff. Under the law as it now stands, if it be found that the importer's commodity is bearing a smaller tax in the form of a tariff than is imposed domestically, then that tax will be made equal to the domestic tax.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What was the purpose of the House in putting this language in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. I do not know. I do not know what is the purpose of a good many things.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, as I understand the situation, the existing law is not changed?

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. The House inserted this language which would change existing law?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. And the Senate committee saw fit to strike it out.

Mr. SMITH. I think the House inserted it because a cry had gone up that Japan was importing into this country cotton goods and selling them at prices lower than the figure at which American manufacturers could make them. Therefore it was thought that whenever that became apparent the tariff on the imported article should be raised to a point where it would prohibit the importation. That, in my opinion, was the intent of the language we find in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. And that is contrary to the philosophy of the Senator?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. Under the original act, if it were found that an individual was importing into the United States and was paying a tax less than the processing tax, he should pay a tax equal to the processing tax.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, the House intended to give Americans some further degree of protection, and the Senate committee saw fit to strike out the provision?

Mr. SMITH. Yes. It is in the law as it now stands; and if the Senator will read it he will find that it is in the words I have stated.

Mr. JOHNSON. As I understand, the provision being dealt with now is that which begins on page 64, line 20, and goes down to line 14, on page 66.

Mr. SMITH. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not think it has been so stated, but that relates to compensatory taxes which may be levied under certain circumstances; and, as I understand, that provision has not as yet been acted upon.

Mr. SMITH. The provision for a compensatory tax on rayon has not been acted on.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope that it will go over until we may have opportunity carefully to study it, because from the information that is given to me it may be a very necessary weapon under certain circumstances.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from California yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it the Senator's thought that the matter now under discussion should go over until we have had a chance to consider the rayon problem?

Mr. JOHNSON. I want it to go over until we have a chance to look into it. The bill came up suddenly today, so far as I was concerned, and I have not had the opportunity to look at many provisions of it which I desire to examine before they ultimately are determined, and I trust that the amendment will not be acted upon at once.

Mr. COPELAND. I share the view of the Senator.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to recur to the amendment on page 40 and that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to be reconsidered in order that I may offer an amendment, about which I have spoken to the Senator from South Carolina. I was called from the Chamber at the time the amendment was under consideration. I think there will be no opposition to the amendment I propose to offer.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Could we not have action on the other matter first?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of the fact that we find Senators unprepared to go on with certain paragraphs of the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment relating to imports, beginning, on page 64, line 23, and ending on line 22, page 67, be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McGILL in the chair). The part of the amendment affecting section 31 has already been passed over by unanimous consent. Without objection, the entire amendment will be passed over for the day.

Mr. JOHNSON. Including section 31?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Section 31 has already been passed over by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has an amendment which he desires to offer.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment on pages 40 and 41 was agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment of the Senator from Kentucky relates to tobacco?

Mr. BARKLEY. It has particular reference to tobacco, but it is general in its application. I will explain it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend section 12 of the bill as reported by the committee by inserting after the second comma, after the word "thereof", in line 19, on page 40, the following words: "or is less than the fair exchange value by not more than 10 percent."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from South Carolina that I had intended to speak to him about the amendment before the bill was taken up, but it was taken up sooner than he or I thought it would be, and I did not have a chance to confer with him about the amendment. I have conferred with representatives of the Department of Agriculture, and they advise me that the amendment is agreeable, and that they can work it out according to that program.

The meaning is this. In the language on page 40 it is provided:

If the average farm price of any commodity, the rate of tax on the proceeding of which is prescribed in paragraph (2), (3), (4), or (5) of this subsection, during the 2 months immediately preceding and the first 10 months of any marketing year—

(i) is equal to, or exceeds by 20 percent or less, the fair exchange value thereof, the rate of such tax shall be reduced—

And so forth.

My amendment provides that if the fair exchange value is not less than 10 percent below, they may, under those conditions, reduce the processing tax.

I have conferred with Dr. Hudson, who is in charge of the tobacco section; I have conferred with Mr. Chester Davis, who will be in charge of the administration of the act, and they all state that they have worked it out and have discovered that they can reduce the processing tax even where the price is within 10 percent of parity, and still have enough money to carry on the operations. Under those circumstances I believe they ought to be authorized to reduce the processing tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. Tobacco is substantially on a parity now, is it not?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. Or above parity?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is above parity.

Mr. McKELLAR. It seems to me the amendment should be agreed to by all means, and I hope it will be. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a telegram on this subject which is in harmony with the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TAMPA, FLA.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate Office Building:

The A. A. A. amendment in bill H. R. 8492, if enacted, will prove ruinous to the cigar manufacturing industry. Farmers now receiving parity for cigar leaf tobaccos. Surpluses in that commodity have been absorbed and a definite shortage is ahead. Processing tax as proposed in H. R. 8492, despite parity have been reached, is absolutely in negation to understandings made between this industry and the A. A. A. at the beginning of the imposition of the processing tax. Proposed amendment will surely mean the elimination of many manufacturers who have up to date cheerfully cooperated with the administration's requirements. Closing of plants and resulting unemployment bound to occur. The entire situation is obviously unfair and unsound. With fair chance for public hearing, which has been denied up to date, opportunity would have been given to present facts upon which intelligent decision could have been made. In the interests of labor, farmer, consumer, and manufacturer we earnestly pray for your cooperation and assistance to the end that H. R. 8492 be referred back to the Senate subcommittee for fair discussion at public hearing.

FLORIDA CIGAR MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION,
A. L. CUESTA, Jr., President.

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment to the pending bill which I offer and ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was, on page 67, after line 22, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 33. Section 7 of title 1 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended by section 221 of the National Industrial Recovery Act (48 Stat. 210, 15 U. S. C., art. 607), is amended by striking it out and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. The Secretary shall sell cotton held or acquired by him pursuant to authority of this act at his discretion subject only to the conditions and limitations of title 1 of this act: Provided, That the Secretary shall have authority to enter into option contracts with producers of cotton to sell to or for the producers such cotton held and/or acquired by him in such amounts and at such prices and upon such terms and conditions as he, the Secretary, may deem advisable, and such option contracts may be transferred or assigned in such manner as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe.

"Notwithstanding any provisions contained in option contracts heretofore issued and/or any provision of law, assignments made prior to January 11, 1934, of option contracts exercised prior to January 18, 1934, shall be deemed valid upon determination by the Secretary that such assignment was an assignment in good faith of the full interest in such contract and for full value and is free from evidence of fraud or speculation by the assignee.

"Notwithstanding any provision of existing law, the Secretary of Agriculture may, in the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, make public such information as he deems necessary in order to effectuate the purposes of such act."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like the amendment to go over, if it may be done, in order that I may have an opportunity to examine into it.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, there is nothing in this section to examine into. This provision, as read, simply means that wherever a loan has been made on cotton, or whenever there is a surplus and the price is below the cost of production, or unsatisfactory, the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase this cotton, and may redistribute it to producers in lieu of production. It was that for which for years and years I worked here, and had the cooperation of Senators on the other side, who worked in harmony with me to bring about that condition. This amendment simply makes it lawful for the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase this cotton, take it in good faith at a price agreed upon between him and the producer, and resell it to the producer in lieu of production in subsequent years.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the explanation of the Senator may be satisfying to Senators, but I may say that it is not entirely satisfying to me. I do not know what activities have been carried on under existing law with respect to the purchase and disposition of cotton. I do know that a large quantity was purchased, and the price was pegged, as I recollect, at 12 cents per pound; but it seems now that we are to expand the powers of the Secretary of Agriculture—I am speaking without sufficient knowledge of the implications which will arise from this measure—and redistribute purchased cotton to persons who grow cotton.

I have had no chance even to read the amendment and do not understand the purpose for which the cotton is to be redistributed, unless to induce growers of cotton to refrain from producing it. Whether they are to get any monetary advantages from redistribution or distribution I am not able to understand from the explanation made by the Senator from South Carolina. Moreover, I do not understand, Mr. President, what authority the Federal Government or the Secretary of Agriculture has to buy cotton and to deal in cotton, to be a purchaser, a vendor and the vendee, to fix the price of cotton, to peg it at a certain price, to loan money upon it, and to do what this amendment seeks to be authorized to be done, if I understand the statement of the Senator from South Carolina.

A few years ago, Mr. President—and it was when the Republicans were in power—the Congress appropriated $500,000,000 and placed it in the hands of the Farm Board. The Hoover administration and the Republican Party suffered much criticism because of this act and its administration. They were damned by Democrats and condemned by Republicans. They were damned by farmers and condemned by those who had to buy the cotton. I remember the eloquent speeches which were made by Democrats upon the floor of the Senate condemning that policy, and denouncing the authority which was exercised as being in violation of the Constitution of the United States. Yet it seems to me that this measure, if I understand it, is subject to criticism, perhaps more severe than that leveled against the Farm Board and those responsible for it. If it was wrong—and many said it was—to loan money as was done for the purchase of cotton and wheat, and to speculate in those products, then there may be ground for criticizing the policies supported by this bill. Senators will recall that several hundred million dollars were lost—wasted—by the Government through the operations of the Farm Board.

This amendment seems to me to be an unwarranted attempt to assert authority on the part of the Federal Government and to embark it upon activities entirely foreign to the purposes for which it was created.

I should like an opportunity to examine this amendment, and I again request that it may go over, to be considered tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah asks unanimous consent that the amendment go over until tomorrow.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, before action is taken upon that request, I should like to make a statement.

At the time to which the Senator refers we had an enormous surplus of cotton. All Senators remember that cotton was down to an average of about 5 cents a pound. The Government tried to aid by lending a certain amount. I am not now speaking of the action of the Farm Board in connection with the cotton that it pegged or bought at 15 cents a pound; but I think it is my duty now to say that the Farm Marketing Act passed under the Hoover administration was a splendid piece of legislation. It was miserably administered, however, and it met organized opposition from the trade, which ultimately emasculated it and ruined it.

That bill simply provided that $500,000,000 should be turned over to a board as a basis of credit, and they were to act as the selling or marketing agent or bargaining agent of the farmer.

Mr. Legge himself said to me that he did not expect to spend any of the $500,000,000; that the cotton would be turned over in the Southern States to whatever agency they designated, and that the cotton would have financed itself. Had he or the organization been put in possession of 75 or 80 percent of the cotton it would have financed itself, and he could have deducted any reasonable price he saw fit. The same thing, he said, was true of wheat. The appropriation of $500,000,000 and the creation of the organization was a declaration on the part of the Federal Government that it had provided an organization financed and equipped to do for the farmers the marketing which they could not do for themselves. The result was that they did not have handed over to them a bale of cotton or a bushel of wheat.

Under another provision of the bill, however, in order to demonstrate or hope to demonstrate what they might do, they bought certain amounts of wheat and cotton, thinking perhaps if they entered the market and began to demonstrate what might be done others would voluntarily send in their cotton to have it marketed. They bought at 16 cents, which, at the time they bought or loaned, was from 1 cent to 2 cents under the market. Immediately a raid on the cotton market was made throughout the country, and the price was broken far below the price they had loaned on the cotton.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. One of the difficulties which arose out of the Farm Marketing Act, to which the Senator is now referring, is that there was no coordination of production with the attempt to regulate marketing.

Mr. SMITH. And no marketing agreements whatever were entered into with any of the farmers.

Mr. ROBINSON. No. So it may be said that the act proved a failure apparently because of that fact. At least, that is one of the reasons why it resulted in failure. That is not true of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. Whatever other criticism may be directed against it, the fact remains that it has been the principal factor in raising and stabilizing the price of cotton and of other basic commodities dealt in, so that those prices are now two and in some cases three times as high as they were before the act was passed.

That does not tell the whole story, nor the most material part of it. The prices at which these basic commodities were selling before the Agricultural Adjustment Act was enacted were so low that they did not compensate the producers for even the major portion of the costs of production; and if it had not been passed, or if something similar had not been done, the agricultural interests of the Nation would have been ruined.

Mr. SMITH. Let me say, in reference to the criticism made by the Senator from Utah, that, as Senators will recall, we had 10,000,000 bales of surplus cotton, in 4,000,000 bales of which the Government had an equity. I introduced a bill in the Senate providing that the Government might purchase that cotton and redistribute it to the farmers at a price of 6 cents, the average price then being about 5 cents. Everyone familiar with cotton production knows that 6 cents was anywhere from 6 to 8 cents below the cost of production. So we devised the cotton option plan, and wherever a farmer was willing to reduce his crop by half the Government would substitute the other half at 6 cents a pound. What was the result? The 4,000,000 bales known as "option cotton", were allocated. The farmers reduced their crop by 4,000,000 bales and the price went to 12 cents a pound.

Mr. ROBINSON. And the surplus to that extent was disposed of.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; to that extent it was disposed of; the Government got back its 6 cents without losing a penny, and the farmers got $30 a bale on that option cotton, which they had produced in the previous year but had been forced to dispose of below the cost of production. It was simply bought back by the Government at that price and optioned to the farmer in lieu of production by him. The farmer made $30 a bale; the Government got every penny back, and the surplus was reduced by 4,000,000 bales.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator from Utah has a better plan to offer or thinks that the option plan is out of all "whack" with the genius of the American Government, all well and good; but that is all this means, and it has worked to the benefit of those who produced. It has yielded a billion dollars of new money a year to buy commodities produced, in part, in Utah. If the Senator wants to offer an amendment providing that none of the money thus made shall be spent in Utah, I should be very glad to accept it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his generosity, and I am sorry I have now not time to debate this matter with him; I am compelled to go to a committee meeting now in session; but before leaving the floor I desire to challenge the Senator's attention to the declaration made in the Democratic platform of 1932. It reads as follows:

> We condemn the extravagance of the Farm Board, its disastrous action which made the Government a speculator of farm products, and the unsound policy of restricting agricultural products to the demands of domestic markets.

The Senator may find that has not been violated by this bill or by the original act to which the pending bill is supplemental. I think that the original act which was passed has some of the aspects of the farm bill which was condemned, and the policies of the A. A. A. some persons believe are somewhat akin to those of the Farm Board, which was so severely condemned.

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. KING. I am speaking of speculation.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that under the disastrous Republican administration there was necessarily caused a condition from which we are now trying to obtain such salvage as we can. Do not come here and say that we are doing what they did; we are salvaging something from the wreck they created.

Mr. KING. I hope that is true.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I am compelled to leave to attend a committee meeting.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I say, before the Senator from Utah leaves the Chamber, that what we are doing here is in exact line with the provisions of the platform from which the Senator from Utah read.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely.

Mr. President, this plan has passed the experimental stage. I wish to state that the officers of the Agricultural Department were so delighted with the operation of the option plan that they desired to incorporate it in this bill as being one of the most essential features. I think we ought to have a vote on the question now, and I ask for a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] just complained that the Agricultural Department were not following out the Democratic platform, and I think that is a perfectly correct statement. I am sorry that they did not do so, because the Democratic platform on agriculture was much better than the Republican platform. The trouble is, however, the Agricultural Department has followed the Republican platform and not the Democratic platform. I wish to read what the Republican platform says as found on page 347 of the little booklet containing the platform:

> We will support any plan which will help to balance production against demand, and thereby raise agricultural prices, provided it is economically sound.

That is just what the Democratic administration is trying to do; that is what they are trying to carry out.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, does the Senator know of any way by which agricultural prices may be stabilized or put on a profitable basis without some measure of control of production?

Mr. FRAZIER. I think the Democratic platform would have done it if it had been carried out.

Mr. ROBINSON. I think that is what we are doing.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; the majority now are following the Republican platform entirely instead of the Democratic platform.

Mr. SMITH. It is all right. I would ride the devil so long as he were going toward heaven, but I would try to get off when he changed his course.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from North Dakota, who is a Republican, seems to think it is not possible for the Republicans ever to say anything in their platform that has sanity in it; but, so far as the provision that he has read relates to this controversy, it is well worthy of recognition that the failure of the farm marketing act was due to the neglect of the then administration to coordinate its enterprises for the stabilization of prices with regulated production. I do not think anyone, however reckless his views may be, has ever advanced a theory in any platform that you can maintain a sound standard of prices without regard to the amount that is produced, without regard to the supply. Necessarily when you undertake to stabilize prices, say, for instance, with the cost of production, you must have some regard to the amount of production. If you fail to do that, you pile up surpluses until your system, whatever it may be, breaks down or collapses.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, the Democratic platform mentions control of crop surpluses and giving the farmers a price based on the cost of production.

Mr. ROBINSON. That is exactly what we are trying to do.

Mr. FRAZIER. No.

Mr. ROBINSON. Surpluses cannot be controlled without some measure of regulating production. That is a very practical method of regulating production. I am glad to see the Senator from North Dakota reading the Democratic platform. Perhaps this is the first time in his life he has ever engaged in that venture.

Mr. FRAZIER. Oh, no, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. The more he reads it the greater will be his wisdom. [Laughter.]

Mr. FRAZIER. My only complaint is that the Agricultural Department did not carry out the Democratic platform instead of the Republican platform.

Mr. ROBINSON. The statute to which all this controversy is germane is designed to carry out that platform. It may not be carrying it out in the manner the Senator from North Dakota would like to see it done, but, nevertheless, it has accomplished the fundamental purpose of farm relief legislation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield in just a moment. Since 1920 and 1921 there has been before the country a fundamental problem which has entered into various other related problems, and that is the disparity existing between the prices of agricultural products and the prices of other commodities. Every bill which has been passed has been directed to correcting that condition. The Farm Marketing Act failed, for the simple reason that it did not take regard of production while trying to stabilize prices on a sound basis. The reason the Agricultural Adjustment Act, in spite of all the criticisms that have been directed against it, has performed that function is that it has taken into account the necessity of regulating or controlling production while trying to stabilize prices. If there is anyone here—I do not care what his politics is; I do not care what his views on economics may be—who can find any method of stabilizing the prices of products without regard to production, without regard to surpluses, he will do a favor to the country and to the world by bringing forward his plan.

The difficulty is that those who have tried and failed in connection with this problem content themselves with criticizing what has been done, but their criticism is not constructive in that they themselves fail to provide or suggest any remedy. I now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator understand the position of the Senator from South Dakota to be that we should have gone on producing the surpluses and then have tried to do something about it after the surpluses had piled up rather than undertake to avoid the surplus by some method of controlling production? Is that the view of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. ROBINSON. I will yield if I have the floor.

Mr. FRAZIER. It will be remembered, Mr. President, when the three A bill was before the Agricultural Committee of the Senate at the last session, a provision was inserted upon motion of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that would guarantee to the farmers a fixed price for the principal farm commodities, based upon the cost of production for the amount used for home consumption, and the surplus was to be taken care of in some other way, regardless of what they got for the surplus; it should be shipped abroad or kept on the farm or carried over; but on the amount used for consumption at home the farmers were to be given the cost of production as is provided by the Democratic platform. The provision to which I have referred was stricken out in the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, there was advanced the theory that the purpose underlying the bill ought to be made the "parity price", and there was advanced the proposition that it should be made the "cost of production." But there were asserted in connection with the latter proposal at least two difficulties which seemed insuperable. In the first place, there was no consensus of opinion as to exactly what elements enter into the cost of production. There was a wide diversity or difference of conditions throughout the United States as to what the cost of production actually was. There was also a diversity of opinion as to what expenditures should be taken into consideration in determining the cost of production.

The plan finally incorporated in the Agricultural Adjustment Act was the "parity price" plan; that is, to give to agricultural products the same purchasing power possessed by other products during the base period. In order to do that the base period was fixed by statute, and a plan was worked out which was incorporated in the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It is true the parity price has not as yet been reached and maintained, but it is also true that it has been approached so that the purchasing power of staple agricultural products now is two times as great as it was when the bill was passed. That has accomplished a very wholesome purpose. Those who criticize the act and are not satisfied with the results which have been achieved ought to suggest a better plan than that which has been incorporated in the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

I recognize that there are some features of the legislation which are more or less arbitrary and which present difficulties. At the same time, taking the measure as a whole and its effects as a whole, it has been very wholesome, and the Congress dare not abandon it or repeal it. I make that challenge.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I agree the plan has been wholesome and has been of benefit, but the parity price is below cost of production. The Secretary of Agriculture admits it. The head of the A. A. A. admits it. The Senator from Arkansas will admit that so long as the farmers get anything less than cost of production they will continue to go broke.

Mr. ROBINSON. Cost of production is in itself an unsatisfactory basis. Who desires to work all his life merely to realize what he has expended in his work? That is what "cost of production" in common sense means. It means what one must expend in order to produce. Cost of production is itself a standard which has no very great uniformity in economics. The parity price is a price under which the farmers may live, carry on their operations, and enjoy some measure of profit. It is much better than the price which existed prior to the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. The period selected for parity was a time when it was ascertained that the purchasing power of the farm dollar was 100 percent. In other words, the value of the farmer's dollar was exactly equal to the value of the dollar represented by the things he bought.

Mr. ROBINSON. Approximately. "Parity prices", like many other terms which have been used, is a technical term. It is perhaps not entirely accurate to say that in any period the purchasing power of agricultural products was exactly 100 percent compared with all other products. The base period is the time when agricultural commodities were on a fair level with other commodities.

During the war we stimulated production in every way possible. Old men who had long been retired from work were encouraged to resume toiling in the fields, and women and children were encouraged to engage in agricultural production in order that we might be sure there would be an adequate supply for our men at the front and for those of other countries who were associated with us in carrying on the great world conflict. When the great guns were silenced and 4,000,000 of our men were disbanded and sent back from military service into peaceful pursuits, we had a problem which reflected itself in the affairs of the farmers more greatly than in the industrial organizations of the country. There was a disparity.

We were producing more agricultural products than were necessary, more than we could find a market for. There were surpluses and the prices of agricultural products were relatively low compared with industrial products. So the task confronted the country of restoring a measure of parity between agricultural commodities and industrial commodities. That is the task which was undertaken by the enactment of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. It has been nearly achieved. The farmers and the people of the country generally recognize that fact.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the debate on the amendment has drifted into a discussion of the fundamentals underlying the bill. I am pleased that it has done so because it was inevitable and proper that there should be a discussion of the principles involved and the effect which the administration of the Agricultural Adjustment Act had upon agriculture and upon the business of the country. I have been very greatly pleased with the splendid arguments made by the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. It is not my purpose now to attempt to add any contributions to their statements upon the subject.

However, I think it may be well, as we are going to vote on the amendment, to point out the specific purpose of the amendment now under consideration and shortly to be voted on. The amendment has been requested by the administration. It is really pending on calendar of the Senate in the form of a separate bill reported sometime ago from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

It will be recalled that when the original Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed there was incorporated in it—and the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] was the author of the plan—a provision for the acquisition of the farm credit cotton and cotton held by the cooperatives, and options were given to cotton farmers to take that cotton in lieu of producing an equal amount of new cotton. This amendment relates solely to that program.

Under the original bill the Department was required by mandatory provisions to dispose of that cotton by the 31st day of March 1936. That will come shortly after the beginning of the next session of the Congress. There may not be time prior to that date for proper consideration and action. It is certainly unwise, from the standpoint of the administration and the cotton grower, to have this quantity of cotton hanging over the market with a mandatory requirement that it shall be sold regardless of the price prevailing at the time.

The amendment, in the first place, simply removes that limitation upon the time of sale and leaves it in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture as to when the cotton shall be sold. That is advantageous, of course, as we all know. The sudden placing of a large quantity of cotton upon the market, thereby depressing the price, would be disadvantageous not only to the cotton producer but also from the standpoint of the Public Treasury, because a loan of 12 cents per pound has been advanced upon the cotton and it is not in the public interest, simply because of the original limitation in the act, that the entire quantity of cotton should be forced upon the market next spring.

The next provision in the amendment relates to assignments and transfers of the options granted to farmers under that program. The original bill provided that the contracts should be nonassignable. However, that fact was not thoroughly known throughout the district, and it developed that a number of the contracts were sold. The Comptroller General has held that under that section the purchasers and assignees are not proper holders of those options. The amendment simply provides recognition of those options transferred in good faith, where the Secretary finds that they were for full value and free from evidence of fraud or speculation by the assignees.

The other portion of the amendment extends the time of the R. F. C. loan to correspond to the first part of the amendment, which extends and places in the power of the Secretary the time for disposition of this cotton.

So I think, with this explanation, that there should be no real opposition to the adoption of this amendment, which relates almost entirely to the time of disposition, and is offered at the request of the administration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 69, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 34. Section 6 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act is hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 69, after line 4, to insert:

SEC. 35. Section 4 (b) of title 1 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended by the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, is amended by striking out the words "to be available until March 1, 1936" and inserting at the end of said section a new sentence to read as follows: "This sum shall be available until the cotton acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture under authority of title 1 of this act, including cotton futures, shall have been finally marketed by any agency which may have been or may be established by the Secretary of Agriculture for the handling, carrying, insuring, or marketing of any cotton acquired by the Secretary of Agriculture."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 69, after line 16, to insert:

SEC. 36. Section 4 (f) of title 1 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended by the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph to read as follows:

"The word 'obligation' when used in this section shall include (without being limited to) administrative expenses, warehouse charges, insurance, salaries, interest, costs, commissions, and other expenses incident to handling, carrying, insuring, and marketing of said cotton."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 1, after "Sec.", to strike out "32" and insert "37"; and in line 8, after the word "for", where it occurs the second time, to insert "scientific", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 37. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to use as much as he finds advisable of the funds appropriated by the second paragraph of Public Resolution No. 27, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 25, 1934, to carry out section 6 of the act entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include cattle and other products as basic agricultural commodities, and for other purposes", approved April 7, 1934, for scientific experimentation and efforts to eradicate Bang's disease in cattle. Such funds shall be available to carry out such section 6 and for the purposes for which funds are made available by this section until December 31, 1937, and may be used for all necessary expenses in connection therewith, including the employment of persons and means in the District of Columbia and elsewhere.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 70, line 16, after the word "Sec.", to strike out "33" and insert "38"; in the same line, after the word "shall", to insert "(a)"; in line 20, after the word "act", to insert "or (b)"; in the same line, after the matter just inserted, to strike out "nor shall anything contained in this act"; and in line 23, after the word "license", to insert: "or (c) invalidate any agreement entered into pursuant to section 8 (1) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act prior to the enactment of this act, or subsequent to the enactment of this act in connection with a program initiated under such section 8 (1) prior to the enactment of this act, or any act done or agreed to be done or any payment made or agreed to be made in pursuance of any such agreement, either before or after the enactment of this act, or any change in the terms and conditions of any such agreement, or any voluntary arrangements or further agreements which the Secretary finds necessary or desirable in order to complete or terminate such program pursuant to the declared policy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act", so as to make the section read:

SEC. 38. Nothing contained in this act shall (a) invalidate any marketing agreement or license in existence on the date of the enactment hereof, or any provision thereof, or any act done pursuant thereto, either before or after the enactment of this act, or (b) impair any remedy provided for on the date of the enactment thereof for the enforcement of any such marketing agreement or license, or (c) invalidate any agreement entered into pursuant to section 8 (1) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act prior to the enactment of this act, or subsequent to the enactment of this act in connection with a program initiated under such section 8 (1) prior to the enactment of this act, or any act done or agreed to be done or any payment made or agreed to be made in pursuance of any such agreement, either before or after the enactment of this act, or any change in the terms and conditions of any such agreement, or any voluntary arrangements or further agreements which the Secretary finds necessary or desirable in order to complete or terminate such program pursuant to the declared policy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to section 39, and ask unanimous consent to have it printed and lie on the table; and by agreement it is to go over until tomorrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I observe that the remaining portions of the bill are new. I ask unanimous consent that on page 73, beginning with line 18, the amendments to the Kerr Tobacco Act, going through to line 9 on page 77, be passed over for the day. I do that—and I apologize for making the request—because I have had some complaints from my State about the amendments, and I should like the opportunity to look at them before we take action here.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am perfectly agreeable to that course. I am temporarily in charge of the bill, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] having been temporarily called from the Chamber. He is the author of the amendments and of the act. If agreeable to the Senator from New York, I prefer to pass over the matter temporarily until the return of the Sennator from South Carolina to the Chamber. He will be back in a very short time.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. I am only asking that I have an opportunity to look over the complaints I have received.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I say, let us just temporarily pass over the amendments. I would rather have that done.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments referred to will be temporarily passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the next section as proposed by the committee, section 39, I contend ought not to be in the bill at all. I think section 39 has no true relation to the proposed legislation. It ought not to be proposed here; and I am going to ask that the committee amendment known as "section 30" be rejected wholly.

I am somewhat familiar with this question by reason of a study we made in the Committee on Banking and Currency and considerable hearings which we held when we had before us the Farm Credit Act of 1935. Last February a bill known as "Senate Bill 1384" was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. We had extended hearings on it; and this provision—practically the same thing, word for word—was proposed as an amendment to that bill. The committee examined the subject very carefully. The proposition was submitted in connection with section 12 of that bill, and the effort was to amend section 12 by inserting this sort of thing. The committee voted against it, voted it down, and would not allow it to be put on the bill, as it did not consider the proposition sound. When the bill came to the Senate the same matter was again proposed, and was offered in the Senate as an amendment to the Farm Credit Act of 1935. It was then discussed here, reviewed to a considerable extent, and rejected. Now it appears here as an amendment to this bill. When I read the bill I recognized it as an old acquaintance, and I inquired of Governor Myers about it, and I have a letter from him which I ask to have read by the clerk. I think it will be interesting to the whole Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I had risen merely for the purpose of suggesting, on behalf of the cooperative associations, that the amendment referred to would establish a principle which would return to plague those cooperative associations in the future, and they were hoping it would not be enacted as a part of the bill. I recognize that it does not affect the particular productions of the territory from which I come; but in that territory are located the greatest cooperative associations in the United States, and they feel that to establish a precedent such as would be established here by this amendment might ultimately interfere with the continued good work which those cooperatives are doing.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the Senator is correct. The language would appear to limit the amendment to the marketing of cotton, but it will undoubtedly refer to the marketing of other commodities.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, Mr. President; it refers only to cotton. It is intended to apply only to cotton. If the Senator has any apprehension about its applying to any other cooperatives, all he will have to do is to suggest the words, and I shall certainly accept them.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I recognize that what the Senator from Tennessee says is correct. The amendment does apply only to cotton, it is true; but it establishes a rule concerning loans to cooperative cotton associations which, if applied to other cooperative associations, would be not only detrimental, but in some instances absolutely ruinous.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture discusses that matter in a letter which I have here.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to ask that this amendment go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I have the letter read?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; but I wish the pending amendment to go over. I myself desire to offer an amendment to it; and I ask that it go over in its entirety.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the letter be read.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when the junior Senator from Mississippi offered an amendment it was my understanding that he then asked unanimous consent, which was granted, that the matter go over until tomorrow. He asked to have the amendment printed and to lie on the table, and that the section go over until tomorrow.

Mr. McKELLAR. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that, but I want the letter read.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer an amendment to be printed and to lie upon the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I wish to have the letter read, so that it will go into the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida asks that the clerk read a letter, and, without objection, the clerk will read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

FARM CREDIT ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D. C., July 9, 1935.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Chairman Senate Committee on Banking and Currency,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Receipt is acknowledged of your letter of July 6, 1935, requesting my comments on the effect of the enactment of section 39 of bill H. R. 8492, entitled "An act to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", passed by the House of Representatives on June 18, 1935, and reported with amendments to the Senate on July 3, 1935, by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry (S. Rept. No. 1011). The section in question reads as follows:

"SEC. 39. No cotton cooperative association shall be eligible for any loan authorized to be made to cooperative associations by any agency of the Government unless such association handles the products of or supplies of bona fide cotton-producing members in an amount at least equal in value to such as are dealt in for persons other than such bona fide members." (Italics added.)

Under the prohibition contained in the foregoing amendment, no cotton cooperative association would be eligible for a loan from any agency of the Government unless such association handles the products or supplies of "bona fide cotton-producing members." The term "any agency of the Government" would prohibit the making of loans from the revolving fund provided for in the Agricultural Marketing Act, and from the Central Bank for Cooperatives and the regional banks for cooperatives created under the Farm Credit Act of 1935, and the Federal intermediate-credit banks, if the conditions stated in the amendment are not complied with.

While section 39 does not purport to amend any act of Congress, it will in fact amend subsection (a) of section 15 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended by section 12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1935. Section 15 as amended reads as follows:

"(a) As used in this act, the term 'cooperative association' means any association in which farmers act together in processing, preparing for market, handling, and/or marketing the farm products of persons so engaged, and also means any association in which farmers act together in purchasing, testing, grading, processing, distributing, and/or furnishing farm supplies and/or farm business services: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof as such producers or purchasers and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

"First. That no member of the association is allowed more than one vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; and

"Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 percent per annum.

"And in any case to the following:

"Third. That the association shall not deal in farm products, farm supplies, and farm business services with or for nonmembers in an amount greater in value than the total amount of such business transacted by it with or for members. All business transacted by any cooperative association for or on behalf of the United States or any agency or instrumentality thereof shall be disregarded in determining the volume of member and nonmember business transacted by such association." (Italics added.)

It is evident that the proponents of section 39 are attempting to increase the eligibility requirements for credit of all cotton cooperatives and thereby deny to them the privileges which they now enjoy under the provisions of section 15 just above referred to. For example, these associations would be required to count as a part of their nonmember business any transaction carried on for the Government or any of its agencies.

In reality the amendment would render the American Cotton Cooperative Association ineligible to borrow from the Government or from the Central Bank for Cooperatives. At present this association is the central sales agency of 14 State or regional cooperative associations which are, in turn, owned or controlled solely by cotton farmers. While the association handles cotton of bona fide producers, its membership is made up of local cooperative associations of producers. Furthermore, the American Cotton Cooperative Association would, in all probability, be rendered ineligible to borrow on account of the volume of cotton which it handles for the Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Commodity Credit Corporation, all of which cotton would of necessity have to be regarded as a part of the products dealt in for persons other than bona fide cotton-producing members.

You will recall that on February 5, during the hearings before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on bill S. 1384 (the Farm Credit Act of 1935), Mr. George B. Coate, of Little Rock, Ark., appeared as a witness on behalf of the American Cotton Shippers Association, a trade association composed of cotton merchants. Mr. Coate objected to section 12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1935, which amended subsection (a) of section 15 of the Agricultural Marketing Act on the grounds that there existed no fundamental distinction between certain cooperative associations, including the American Cotton Cooperative Association, and cotton merchants. He contended, therefore, that the cotton merchants should either be entitled to the same credit facilities that are now extended by the Government to cotton cooperative associations or that there should be placed a definite limitation on the amount of nonmember business which such associations might handle and remain eligible to borrow, and that cotton handled for the Government should be regarded as nonmember business.

In principle I can see no difference between section 39 of bill H. R. 8492 and Mr. Coate's proposed amendment to the Farm Credit Act of 1935, which the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency declined to adopt. For your convenient reference I am attaching hereto a copy of part 2 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency on bill S. 1384, on pages 66, 69, 70, 71, and 72, of which we have underscored the statements made by Mr. Coate to which I have referred.

I would like also to call to your attention the statements made by Mr. N. C. Williamson, a cotton farmer of Lake Providence, La., and the president of the American Cotton Cooperative Association, appearing on pages 73 to 83, part 2, of the report of the same hearing. I should like for you to consider particularly the statement by the Farm Credit Administration relating to complaints of cotton shippers against American cotton cooperative associations, which begins on page 76.

In this connection it seems to me that there is no basis for the complaints that have been made by cotton shippers and merchants, in view of the fact that the cooperative associations dealing in agricultural commodities are following accepted and recognized business practices. No law has been brought to my attention which prevents a cotton cooperative from functioning in this way. Any earnings which are made are for the ultimate advantage of the growers themselves. In 1934 the American Cotton Cooperative Association returned these surplus earnings to the growers in the form of a patronage dividend paid on a per-bale basis.

Although section 39 is directed only to the sale of cotton, its adoption may seriously affect the orderly marketing of other commodities. For instance, if the marketing of cotton may be made the subject of special legislation, designed to curtail the activities or available credit of the central sales agency for such commodity, local associations of producers of other agricultural products will hesitate to enter into any marketing programs which are dependent upon obtaining a line of credit from the Farm Credit Administration or from any of the institutions under its supervision for fear that the commercial agencies dealing in the same products may successfully promote similar legislation for their benefit.

In the circumstances I recommend that section 39 of bill H. R. 8492 be eliminated.

Sincerely yours,

W. I. MYERS, Governor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have a copy of the hearings referred to, but I will not bother the Senate now to read from them. They are available, and the arguments and reasons pertaining to this proposition are very clearly set forth in the hearings before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

At the same time I inquired of Governor Myers about the effect of the amendment, in response to which inquiry he wrote the letter which has just been read; I inquired also of the Secretary of Agriculture, and since this matter has come up the reply of the Secretary has come to me. I have it here now, but it is getting late, and I will not ask to have it read. However, I ask to have it printed in the RECORD. He concludes by saying:

If cotton cooperatives can meet the qualifications which Congress has laid down and which are administered by these agencies, there would appear no justification for this provision which apparently discriminates against cotton cooperatives.

I ask to have the whole letter printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, July 10, 1935.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: You have asked me for comments on section 39 of H. R. 8492, which relates to cotton cooperatives, and undertakes to render ineligible cotton cooperative associations for Government credit "unless such association handles the products of or supplies of bona fide cotton-producing members in an amount at least equal in value to such as are dealt in for persons other than such bona fide members."

Primarily this is a matter of concern to the Farm Credit Administration. Yet the question raised is, of course, of vital importance to the general principle of cooperative marketing. As you pointed out in your letter, the Banking and Currency Committee, in considering the Farm Credit Act of 1935, considered the complaints of the cotton trade which section 39 of H. R. 8492 seeks to relieve. Your committee at that time declined to adopt an amendment somewhat similar to the section under discussion.

There are two points which occur to me to merit special consideration. They are:

(1) By the use of the term "bona fide cotton-producing members" the section purports to qualify the concept of "members" as used in prior legislation pertaining to cooperative associations. Such legislation defining cooperative associations and setting up standards of qualification for them are: (a) The Capper-Volstead Act (42 Stat. 388 (1922)); (b) section 15 (a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act (approved June 15, 1929) (46 Stat. 18); (c) section 55 (a) of the Farm Credit Act of 1933, amending section 15 (a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act (48 Stat. 257); and (d) section 12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1935, amending the Agricultural Marketing Act and the Farm Credit Act of 1933 (Public, No. 87).

Appearing in all of these statutes is a provision that an association "shall not deal in the products of nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members." The Farm Credit Act of 1933 and the Farm Credit Act of 1935 contain a further provision to the effect that the association "shall not deal in supplies for nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members." And while no qualification of the term "members" such as appears in section 39 is present in any of these statutes, they all uniformly make producer membership and producer control a basic essential of cooperative organization, with a proviso that operations shall be for the mutual benefit of members as producers. The use of the term "bona fide cotton-producing members" in this section is susceptible of an interpretation restricting farm-credit facilities to local independent cooperative associations, thus excluding organizations composed of local or independent cooperative associations. Although the prior legislation already referred to does not expressly allude to such organizations composed of a group of local or independent associations, the Capper-Volstead Act permits associations to have marketing agencies in common, and an opinion of the Attorney General (36 Op. Atty. Gen. 336 (1930)) has been rendered to the effect that loans by the Federal Farm Board, now the Federal Farm Administration, may be extended to such organizations provided they qualify otherwise.

(2) The second consideration which is of concern to the Agricultural Adjustment Administration relates to business transacted for or on behalf of the Government. In failing expressly to provide that business transacted by any cooperative association for the Government shall be disregarded in determining the volume of member and nonmember business transacted by such association, the section sets up a standard of qualification for obtaining credit facilities with respect to cotton cooperatives different from that applicable to all other classes of cooperatives under section 12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1935. This section provides that in calculating member and nonmember business done by any cooperative association, that transacted for or on behalf of the United States or any agency thereof be disregarded.

It is to be noted that section 12 of the Farm Credit Act of 1935 was enacted to cure a defect in prior legislation which did not contain a reference to business done for the United States and which, therefore, the Federal court in the case of Board of Trade of City of Chicago v. Wallace (67 F. (2d) 402 (1933)) interpreted as meaning that all business not done for members was to be regarded as having been done for nonmembers. The effect of section 39 of the proposed amendments, it is suggested, is to follow the interpretation of the court in the case just cited, particularly since the division is on the basis of "members" and "persons other than such bona fide members." It is, therefore, my view that section 39, which is in reality an amendment to the Farm Credit Act of 1935, should be considered apart from the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act now pending. It would appear that if this amendment is adopted Congress would reverse its already established policy relative to farmer-owned and farmer-controlled marketing institutions. The question of membership structure is a matter which is under the jurisdiction of the Farm Credit Administration or the Bureau of Internal Revenue with reference to tax matters. If cotton cooperatives can meet the qualifications which Congress has laid down and which are administered by these agencies, there would appear no justification for this provision which apparently discriminates against cotton cooperatives.

Sincerely,

H. A. WALLACE, Secretary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this matter will be argued tomorrow, so I am not now going to take any time on it, except to say that this provision applies only to cotton cooperatives, and the cotton dealers of my section of the country are absolutely being put out of business by this cooperative association which is backed by the Government. In other words, money is furnished this cooperative association by the Government for the purpose of putting those engaged in the cotton trade absolutely out of business. Hundreds of them in my section of the country are being put out of business, and many are out of business already, as a matter of fact.

What is the result? The result is that the cotton trade is being monopolized by four great companies. What are those companies? One is Weil & Co., the next one is McFadden & Co., the next one is Anderson, Clayton & Co., and the fourth is the Cotton Cooperative Association, backed by the United States Government, and all the money necessary to put the cotton dealers out of business is furnished by the Government.

They do not confine their business to their members; they obtain the business from people who are not members. It was never intended that that should be done. They are going wholly out of bounds. All this amendment does is to provide that dealers who have been in the cotton business all the time, and who have managed it and controlled it well, and who have done a good job for the farmer, shall not be absolutely destroyed by a Government-controlled corporation. What is the result? The result is that these four great concerns—Anderson, Clayton & Co., Weil & Co., McFadden & Co., and the United States Government, through the cooperatives—are monopolizing the business.

What has the cooperative in cotton done? I desire to read a short joint resolution which was introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]. I ask Senators to listen to this:

That for the purpose of adjustment and settlement of losses—

Settlement of losses—

sustained by the cooperative marketing associations dealing in grain during the stabilization operations of the Federal Farm Board in the years 1929 and 1930 when such cooperative marketing associations were induced and requested by the Federal Farm Board to withhold grain and/or cotton from the market and to make advances to their members in order to stabilize prices, the Federal Farm Credit Administration—

By the way, the Federal Farm Credit Administration is presided over by Dr. Myers, who has just written the letter which was put into the RECORD by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]— is hereby authorized and directed to make such adjustments and settlements in accordance with the understanding that such cooperative marketing associations had with the Federal Farm Board, and on the basis of a price or a sum equal to the amount directly loaned or advanced to such associations plus carrying charges and operation costs in connection with such grain and/or cotton from the date of the loans or advances to the date that such grain and/or cotton was finally taken over by the Federal Farm Board or delivered pursuant to its instructions.

What does that mean? It means that the cooperative cotton associations went on the market and gambled in cotton during these years, and sustained enormous losses; and now they are asking the Government to pay back those losses when they gambled in the name of the Government!

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I am not interested in any losses of the cotton cooperatives——

Mr. McKELLAR. I thought the Senator from North Dakota was a cotton expert who was here offering a measure in the interest of the downtrodden cotton cooperatives of the South who had been gambling in cotton.

Mr. FRAZIER. No, no, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator's joint resolution has that effect.

Mr. FRAZIER. No; this joint resolution does not refer to gambling in cotton at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, it does not refer to it, but it provides that the United States Government shall make up the losses of the cotton cooperatives. That is what it does. I desire to give the Senator credit for offering to strike out cotton. I admire him and respect him for that; and whenever the joint resolution comes up, if he is willing to strike out cotton, I am perfectly willing that his joint resolution may be passed, because I do not know anything about wheat, and he knows something about it. I am not familiar with it. I know, however, that the cooperatives that this Government is backing is a monopoly, or an attempted monopoly, of the cotton business, have had their losses, and that the Government ought not to stand the losses.

Mr. President, what is the program? The program is that the Government goes into partnership with the cooperatives. If cotton goes down, the Government pays the losses. If it goes up, the cooperatives get the benefit. That is what it is. I do not think that is fair. I do not think it is fair to put all the private cotton dealers out of business for the benefit of cooperatives who have absolutely failed, with two exceptions. One is the Mississippi Long Staple Cotton Growers' Association—that is a splendid association—and the other is a new one which has grown up more recently.

As a matter of fact, if this joint resolution introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] shall pass—and what he has to do with cotton I do not know; I do not think any cotton is grown in his part of the country—but if the joint resolution is passed as introduced by the Senator from North Dakota, it will cost the Government millions of dollars. For whose benefit? For the benefit of a lot of gamblers who were in a cotton cooperative association.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I had no interest whatever in the cotton gamblers.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is doing them a great service.

Mr. FRAZIER. The joint resolution as originally introduced applied only to the cooperatives dealing in wheat; but at the request of some of the cotton cooperatives they were included when the joint resolution was considered by the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. It was a very fine gambling scheme for them to be included in this way, and the joint resolution came very near passing by unanimous consent in the Senate.

Mr. FRAZIER. It did pass the Senate last year.

Mr. McKELLAR. It got through by common consent, without anyone knowing it applied to cotton.

Mr. FRAZIER. The joint resolution simply provided that any losses should be put up to the Farm Credit Administration, which was to pass on the question; and I feel confident that the Farm Credit Administration would not approve the payment by the Government of any losses incurred in gambling on the market.

Mr. McKELLAR. The cooperatives bought cotton futures, just as other gamblers on the market did; and the mere fact that they operated under the title of "cooperatives" did not make it any less gambling. They lost, and the Senator's joint resolution undertakes to have the Government sustain those losses. I am opposed to that measure, and it was for that reason that I offered this amendment.

By the way, someone—I do not remember his name, and it is immaterial anyway—wrote a letter saying that this amendment was put in the bill by stealth. I ask the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry if I did not come before the full committee with the amendment and ask that his committee adopt the amendment, and if I did not make an argument somewhat similar to that which I am making today in the Senate. I do not do things by stealth when it comes to legislation, or when it comes to anything else. That man was simply fabricating his story. That is all there is to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I wish to remind the Senator from Tennessee that, in addition to his coming before the committee, he offered the amendment on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course I did. If ever a matter was dealt with openly and aboveboard, this one was. I think every Senator here will bear me out when I say I have never undertaken to "put anything over" upon this body or anybody else by stealth. I am not that kind of a man.

Tomorrow, Mr. President, I shall finish what I have to say about this matter.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to return to a matter which I think we can dispose of without any debate or discussion, and that is the amendment on page 11, line 3, "wool and mohair."

I have canvassed the situation with regard to this amendment, and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH] is entirely willing that the amendment should be rejected. So far as I know, the representatives of States which would be particularly interested are of the same view. Has the Senator from South Carolina any objection to that amendment being rejected?

Mr. SMITH. Not the slightest, because I think the amendment was put in the bill under the impression that it was desired by the wool producers; and if their representatives here desire it to go out, the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has no objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment on page 11, to which I have just made reference, be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 3, after the word "milk", it is proposed to insert "wool and mohair."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I ask that that amendment be rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the committee amendment on page 11, line 3. The amendment is rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I understand that we have now reached page 71, together with amendments which are passed over. If we take a recess now, we can begin tomorrow on page 71, with line 19. So far as I am concerned, as chairman of the committee, I should be very glad if we might now take a recess until tomorrow.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I promised the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], who desires to submit some reports from his committee, to call a quorum before recess is taken. I am glad to do so, because I am interested in one of the reports he is to make. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Johnson	Pittman
Ashurst	Coolidge	Keyes	Pope
Austin	Copeland	King	Radcliffe
Bachman	Costigan	La Follette	Reynolds
Bailey	Davis	Lewis	Robinson

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I announce the absence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN], occasioned by a death in his family, and the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], detained in his home State by official matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

RESOLUTIONS REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE TO AUDIT AND CONTROL THE CONTINGENT EXPENSES OF THE SENATE

Mr. BYRNES. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report back favorably with amendments Senate Resolutions 165, 147, and 169, and Senate Resolution 166 without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the resolutions for which the Senator from South Carolina requests consideration.

LOBBYING ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH HOLDING-COMPANY BILL

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 165), submitted by Mr. BLACK on the 2d instant, and reported this day by Mr. BYRNES from the Committee to Audit and Control the Continent Expenses of the Senate, with amendments.

The amendments of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate were, on page 1, to strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the lobbying activities in connection with the so-called "holding-company bill." The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of all lobbying activities and all efforts to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation, directly or indirectly, in connection with the so-called "holding-company bill", or any other matter or proposal affecting legislation. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation.

On the same page, line 12, after the word "employ", to strike out "such" and insert "and to call upon the executive departments for"; and on page 2, line 7, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$50,000"; so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of all lobbying activities and all efforts to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation, directly or indirectly, in connection with the so-called "holding company bill", or any other matter or proposal affecting legislation. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ and to call upon the executive departments for clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution go over for the day under the rule.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that the resolution, insofar as policy is concerned, was unanimously approved by the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate?

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that; but a request has come to me to have it go over for the day.

Mr. BLACK. Would the Senator object to stating who submitted the request?

Mr. McNARY. I object in my own right.

Mr. BLACK. I wish to give notice that tomorrow at 12 o'clock, as soon as the Senate convenes, I shall ask to proceed to the consideration of the resolution, and if there be objection, I shall make a motion to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On objection, the resolution will go over.

INVESTIGATION OF STEAMSHIP DISASTERS—LIMIT OF EXPENDITURES

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 147) submitted by Mr. COPELAND on June 3, 1935, reported this day by Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with an amendment, in line 1, to strike out "$25,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$10,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That the sum of $10,000 be made available to the Committee on Commerce from the contingent fund of the Senate to cover expenses incurred by the committee in the continued exercise of its privileges and duties prescribed by Senate Resolution No. 7, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

PRODUCTION, TRANSPORTATION, AND MARKETING OF WOOL

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 160) submitted by Mr. ADAMS and Mr. STEIWER on June 24, 1935, and reported this day by Mr. BYRNES, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, with amendments.

The amendments of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate were, on page 1, line 1, before the word "Senators", to strike out "three" and insert "five"; on page 2, line 12, after the word "papers" and the comma, to insert "correspondence"; and in line 13, before the word "documents", to insert "other", so as to make the resolution read:

Whereas wool is one of the major agricultural products of many sections of the United States and is used in many industries and provides a substantial part of the commerce of the country; and

Whereas proper methods of marketing wool are essential to the establishment and maintenance of the prosperity of the industry; and

Whereas existing methods of marketing the wool crop have proved unsatisfactory to the wool producers of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the production, transportation, and marketing of wool. The committee shall report to the Senate, not later than the beginning of the second session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution, the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth Congress, to employ such clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, correspondence, and other documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures, as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $10,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

LYDA BEERY

The resolution (S. Res. 166) submitted by Mr. COPELAND on the 8th instant and reported this day by Mr. BYRNES from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1935, to Lyda Beery, sister of Lutie M. Hart, late an assistant clerk to the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, a sum equal to 6 months' compensation at the rate she was receiving by law at the time of her death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting sundry nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

ALICE L. WOOLMAN

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nomination of Alice L. Woolman to be postmaster at Coweta, Okla., may be recommitted to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

STATE ADMINISTRATORS IN WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read; and he will then ask the Senate's pleasure about the matter of the committee to which the nominations should be referred.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
July 10, 1935.

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate the following-named persons for appointment as State administrators in the Works Progress Administration, as follows:

Thad Holt, for Alabama.
W. R. Dyess, for Arkansas.
Frank Y. McLaughlin, for California.
Paul D. Shriver, for Colorado.
Matthew J. Daly, for Connecticut.
C. B. Treadway, for Florida.
J. L. Hood, for Idaho.
Robert J. Dunham, for Illinois.
Wayne Coy, for Indiana.
Evan Griffith, for Kansas.
George H. Goodman, for Kentucky.
John H. Mackall, for Maryland.
Harry Lynn Pierson, for Michigan.
Wayne Alliston, for Mississippi.
Victor Christgau, for Minnesota.
Matthew S. Murray, for Missouri.
Ray Hart, for Montana.
D. F. Felton, for Nebraska.
William H. J. Ely, for New Jersey.
Lea Rowland, for New Mexico.
Lester Herzog, for New York.
G. W. Coan, Jr., for North Carolina.
Thomas H. Moodie, for North Dakota.
E. W. S. Key, for Oklahoma.
E. J. Griffith, for Oregon.
Edward N. Jones, for Pennsylvania.
J. Burleigh Cheney, for Rhode Island.
Lawrence Pinckney, for South Carolina.
M. A. Kennedy, for South Dakota.
Harry S. Berry, for Tennessee.
H. P. Drought, for Texas.
Darrell J. Greenwell, for Utah.
William A. Smith, for Virginia.
George H. Gannon, for Washington.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Appropriations Committee handled the legislation under which the nominations are submitted. As a usual thing, very few nominations go to that committee. The Chair wishes to have the Senate discuss the matter and determine the reference of the nominations.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, inasmuch as the Appropriations Committee has jurisdiction of the general legislation, I think it is very clear that the nominations should be referred to that committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I believe several similar nominations have already been referred to the Appropriations Committee, and it would be carrying out that precedent to refer these nominations to it. I think one previous nomination went to another committee, though I do not remember what committee it was.

I think the nominations should be referred to the Appropriations Committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The calendar is now in order.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Thursday, July 11, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate July 10 (legislative day of May 13), 1935

ASSISTANT ATTORNEY GENERAL

John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, to be an assistant attorney general, vice Harold M. Stephens, appointed assistant to the Attorney General.

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE

Dr. Thornburn S. McGowan to be assistant surgeon in the United States Public Health Service, to take effect from date of oath.

STATE ENGINEER FOR PUBLIC WORKS ADMINISTRATION

Robert A. Radford, of Minnesota, to be State engineer for the Public Works Administration in Minnesota.

STATE ADMINISTRATORS IN THE WORKS PROGRESS ADMINISTRATION

Thad Holt, for Alabama.
W. R. Dyess, for Arkansas.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, Thy holy word is with us: The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul; the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple; the statutes of the Lord are right, rejoicing the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes; the fear of the Lord is clean, enduring forever; the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they than gold; yea, than much fine gold; sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb. Keep back Thy servants from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me; then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression. Let the words of my mouth and the meditations of my heart be acceptable in Thy sight, O Lord, my strength and my redeemer. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5599) entitled "An act to regulate the strength and distribution of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 2796) entitled "An act to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating, or marketing securities, in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails; to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce; to amend the Federal Water Power Act; and for other purposes", requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. WHEELER, Mr. BARKLEY, Mr. BROWN, Mr. WHITE, and Mr. SHIPSTEAD to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

STRENGTH OF THE LINE OF THE NAVY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 5599) to regulate the strength and distribution of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes, for printing under the rule.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and seventy-nine Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

THE ADMINISTRATION'S FUTILE EFFORTS TO PRESERVE WORLD PEACE

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an address made by me at the annual banquet of the Maryland Congress of Parent-Teachers' Associations at the University of Maryland, Tuesday evening, July 9, 1935:

The answer of Secretary of State Hull to the appeal of Haile Selassie, Emperor of Abyssinia, to enforce the Briand-Kellogg Peace Pact is about the most evasive and weakest State Department document on record. It would be hard to find in the archives of the State Department for the past 150 years one that equals or approaches its evasive ponderosity and glittering generalities.

The whole civilized world stands aghast at the brutality, avariciousness, and greedy imperialism of Mussolini. The Italian Dictator, in utter disregard of his country's obligations under the League of Nations and the Kellogg Pact, announces that he proposes to wage war and conquer Abyssinia by force of arms. Peace-loving people are horrified by Mussolini's avowal that he will resort to war and ignore arbitration.

As a friend of the Italian people, who have little or no voice in their own domestic and foreign affairs, I deplore their being led to slaughter to carry out the imperial ambitions of Mussolini. The Government of the United States had a glorious opportunity to strike a blow for peace that would have been heard throughout the world. All we had to do was to issue a clear and bold statement that the signatories of the Paris Peace Pact had plighted their word not to go to war, and if they violated that pledge an aroused public opinion would condemn the offending nation throughout the civilized world. Such a statement would have been acclaimed by the war-weary people in every nation who have been hoping for some unselfish and enlightened leadership. But instead, the administration gives lip service to peace and parrot-like repeats "Peace, peace," when there is no peace.

The only time to wage war is in time of peace. It is self-evident that if we, as a signatory of the Paris Peace Pact outlawing war as an instrument of national policy except for defense, had issued an appeal to arbitration and in behalf of peace, it would have set in motion political, economic, and moral pressure on Italy or any other nation preparing for war.

The failure of the League of Nations to act constructively to prevent the threatened war between Italy and Abyssinia dooms that institution to oblivion and exposes it as a hollow shell and a sham peace covenant, dominated by France, Italy, and Great Britain for their own selfish purposes. Thank goodness we have had the wisdom and good judgment to keep out of all foreign intrigues and entanglements, ancient blood feuds, and boundary disputes.

We should appeal to world public opinion and exert our moral and economic leadership to prevent another war, but if there is war between Italy and Abyssinia or elsewhere in Europe, it is their war and not ours, and we do not propose to be dragged into it or permit the life of a single American to be sacrificed on foreign soil or in other people's wars.

PUT TAX BURDENS WHERE THEY BELONG

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILDEBRANDT. Mr. Speaker, the expected flood of complaints because of the President's tax program is pouring forth from every reactionary source. Wall Street Republicans, joining hands with Wall Street Democrats and William Randolph Hearst, are proving once more that they are "brothers under the skin."

I am confident that the vicious campaign of misrepresentation they are conducting is not deceiving many. The people are getting their eyes open and they are refusing to be kidded and bamboozled as easily as they once were. It is fortunate that this is so, for never in American history has the lie factory of the reactionaries worked at such high speed in turning out fabrications and fictions and yarns and whoppers as in these days. The aristocracy of Jefferson's and Jackson's time lied brazenly enough about those intrepid champions of the rights of the masses but the falsifying of that period, compared with with the treacherous propaganda of the present, was as the harmless make-believe tales of a child in comparison with the smooth and subtle softsoap of a swindler.

The front page of a plutocratic daily on my desk contains the headline, "'Soak All' Tax Yield Set at 901 Million", and a few lines further I read, "'Little Man', Investors, to Pay." This, of course, is absolutely untrue.

The tax will not hit the little man except insofar as it involves moderate schedules for those with low incomes. It will, to be sure, mean a high charge against individuals and corporations with vast incomes and this is entirely proper. Too long the burden of taxation has rested disproportionately on the backs of the poor and middle classes. No action ever taken by President Roosevelt will meet with more universal approval than his demand that taxes be regraded according to incomes and the ability of taxpayers to meet them.

Of all the hypocritical phrases ever used by experts in "humbuggery", that characterizing the Presidential plan, a "soak the thrifty" program, is the most contemptible.

The program does not "soak" anybody. It simply distributes taxation in proportion to people's ability to pay.

The most unfair feature of the phrase though is the reference to "the thrifty." Nobody knows better than the authors of this twaddle that men with millions and billions of dollars did not acquire their wealth by "thrift." They got it by extracting profits from the public, by charging high prices, by paying low wages, by working their employees long hours, by adulterating their products, by misleading advertising, and by all the endless tricks and devices utilized under the capitalist system. That they should be compelled to pay taxes ranging from 4.8 percent on $5,000 to 84.4 percent on $10,000,000 on incomes, inheritances, and gifts is far from unreasonable.

When I reflect on the suffering that has swept like a pestilence over our land in recent years, I feel inclined to remark that these exploiters ought to consider themselves lucky that the Government does not confiscate the fortunes in the million- and billion-dollar category as a necessary emergency act. My own frank advice to the man or corporation with a huge fortune is to accept the President's tax schedules good naturedly in a spirit of willingness to subordinate their desires to the public welfare. If they are too stubborn and short-sighted to do this, they may to their sorrow face far more drastic action than what Mr. Roosevelt has suggested. The people will not always tolerate the concentration of colossal wealth into the hands of a few. The possessors of such wealth had better acquiesce in graduated and scientifically regulated taxes rather than exasperate our citizenship by their obstinacy until unearned riches are actually confiscated.

It would be informative if some of the critics of taxation that is proportioned to wealth would read and ponder certain forceful sentences in the President's message of June 19. Among those especially worthy of consideration are—

> Therefore, in spite of the great importance in our national life of the efforts and ingenuity of unusual individuals, the people in the mass have inevitably helped to make large fortunes possible. Without mass cooperation great accumulations of wealth would be impossible save by unhealthy speculation. * * *
> Whether it be wealth achieved through the cooperation of the entire community or riches gained by speculation, in either case the ownership of such wealth or riches represents a great public interest and a great ability to pay. * * *
> The transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes by will, inheritance, or gift is not consistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people. * * *
> Great accumulations of wealth cannot be justified on the basis of personal and family security. In the last analysis, such accumulations amount to the perpetuation of great and undesirable concentration of control in a relatively few individuals over the employment and welfare of many, many others.
> Such inherited economic power is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power was inconsistent with the ideals of the generation which created our Government.

In this connection, I should also like to quote from the typically original and pungent comment of Heywood Broun, the brilliant columnist in the Scripps-Howard newspapers, on the President's message. Mr. Broun said:

> In effect, Franklin D. Roosevelt is saying that the American public will no longer stand for the handing down of fortunes as huge as those of Ford or Mellon. The suggestion seems to be that wealthy men ought to be ready to pass on less rather than run the risk of being unable to leave anything. * * * The only people who have reason to howl are a small handful of multi-millionaires, and even their complaints should be tempered by the thought that but for the proposal of the President others might have arisen that would have gone further and cut much more deeply.
> The privilege of handing down wealth is, of course, the privilege of transmitting power. Any one of a dozen princes of industry in America has far more power than King George of England. And he got it in precisely the same way.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 156) to extend the facilities of the Public Health Service to seamen on Government vessels not in the Military or Naval Establishments may be rereferred from the Committee on Interstate Commerce to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DELGADO. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, some time ago you have been regaled with the luscious and beautiful apples grown in the State of Oregon. On other occasions you have been offered the best that is produced in the various regions of this great country. Day before yesterday you had some of the fine pineapples from Hawaii. I feel that it is about time that you should have something from the farthest land under the Stars and Stripes today. [Applause.]

Among the many blessings vouchsafed to the Philippines by a bountiful Providence is the Philippine mango, a fruit unique in its deliciousness and rich in food qualities. Rather than extolling it myself, I should like to refer you to the Members of the House who have been in our islands and have passed favorable judgment upon it—the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. ARNOLD; the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. MCREYNOLDS; the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. DINGELL; the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. THURSTON; the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. STEFAN; and many others.

For centuries all those who have visited the Philippines have marveled at the Philippine mango. It has always been our desire to share this magnificent fruit with the peoples of the four quarters of the globe, but we have always failed because it has been difficult to preserve it for export. Lately a Filipino lady chemist, Dr. Maria Orosa, has found a way of preserving indefinitely its lucious meat in its natural sweetness, and I am happy to announce now that among those who will have the first chance to taste fresh Philippine mangoes in this country will be the ladies and gentlemen of this House, because through the courtesy of the De Santos Packing Co., of Manila, P. I., I have been able to place some in the cloakroom of both sides of the House for you to try. I sincerely hope that you will like our mangoes and that their unique taste may enhance your kindly interest in the Philippines and the Filipinos. [Applause.]

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts for immediate consideration, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 289

Resolved, That the expenses of conducting the investigation authorized by House Resolution 288, incurred by the Committee on Rules, acting as a whole or by subcommittee, not to exceed $50,000, including expenditures for the employment of experts, traveling expenses, and legal, clerical, accounting, stenographic, and other assistants, shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, on vouchers authorized by such committee or by any subcommittee thereof conducting such investigation, signed by the chairman of the committee and approved by the Committee on Accounts.

With the following committee amendment:

At the end of line 11 insert a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the official committee reporters shall be used at all hearings held in the District of Columbia."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, on July 2 as a result of certain charges made here on the floor, and in a moment of hysteria, the House by unanimous vote passed a resolution authorizing an investigation of lobbying activities in connection with the recent utilities bill. On July 8 the scope of that investigation was broadened and by a vote of approximately 315 to 3, the resolution was agreed to. As a result of the action of the House, and carrying out its mandate, the Committee on Accounts now comes in and brings the resolution providing funds for the investigation. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], stated on the floor a few days ago that when all this is over he will rise in his seat and show that nothing had been accomplished.

Mr. BLANTON. Of value to the people.

Mr. WARREN. I concur absolutely in that statement, as I do insofar as 95 percent of these investigations carried on by the committees of the House are concerned. Personally, I think it is $50,000 simply thrown to the winds, but the House has done it and now it is incumbent upon us to provide funds.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Has the Chairman of the Committee on Rules appeared before the Committee on Accounts and indicated that he would need as much money as that for this kind of an investigation?

Mr. WARREN. The Chairman of the Committee on Rules appeared before the committee and stated this amount is necessary, and we are reporting it out in the full amount solely upon the ground of public policy, because of the trend that this investigation has now taken.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Part of my inquiry has been answered by the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], but was there any general program laid out that would convince the Chairman of the Committee on Accounts of the real need of $50,000 to do this work?

Mr. WARREN. The committee was told that on account of the apparent shortness of the present session, this investigation would have to be carried on during the recess, and it was estimated that it would require 4 or 5 months to do it, and, of course, if we should cut the amount to a smaller figure, and during the recess they found they needed more, they would have had no opportunity to come back here to obtain it. It is not going to be charged up to the Committee on Accounts that by withholding funds we were trying to stifle this investigation. This is a unanimous report from the committee, but I think every member of the committee feels that this is a useless investigation. However it has been ordered by the House by an overwhelming vote and now it is water over the mill to come in here at this time and attack the funds with which to do it.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. FISH. Will it be in order to offer an amendment to reduce the amount from $50,000 to $20,000?

Mr. WARREN. I shall not yield for the purpose of an amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. And further, when this resolution was passed on July 8 it was clearly stated on the floor that if we voted to broaden the scope of the inquiry it meant an expenditure of $50,000, and every Member of the House who was present after a quorum call voted for it except three. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The investigation by our Rules Committee of the Brewster charge has been under way since yesterday morning. After the Committee on Rules hears Mr. Greuning and Mr. Moran and Mr. Maverick and a few other witnesses, the incident ought to be closed, and then it could be closed in a conclusive way, and what is the use of wasting $50,000? All of us know that the money will be wasted, and when we know that nothing of value to the people and taxpayers of the country is going to be accomplished, what is the use of shutting our eyes like a blind bull and voting $50,000 out of the Treasury?

Mr. WARREN. Because the House has already passed on the scope of this investigation.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Does not the gentleman feel that we would be presenting a better front if we appropriated instead of $50,000, $10,000? I cannot conceive of any possible way in which more than that could be used. I have no desire to stifle any legitimate inquiry or the uncovering of anything, but it does seem that $50,000 is an enormous sum for this investigation.

Mr. WARREN. We have the assurance of the Chairman of the Committee on Rules that he will try to turn back as much of this fund as possible, and I think that that is all that we can expect.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. In a moment. The Rules Commitee did not seek this investigation. Personally I think it could not have been placed in better hands than in those of the gentlemen who compose this great committee of the House. We have heard criticism here on the floor and in the newspapers of the Committee on Rules, particularly of its chairman.

That has taken place ever since there has been a Rules Committee. I remember when I first came here the gentleman from New York, now the distinguished minority leader [Mr. SNELL], was chairman of that committee. My first impression of him was that he was something terrible [laughter], until I began to appreciate his value in the House and his value to the country as an able legislator. [Applause.] Even the beloved, lamented Edward W. Pou, from North Carolina, was criticized as chairman of that committee; and even our beloved leader, the short time the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] was chairman of that committee he likewise met with the same criticism; and now it is being heaped upon the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. I say this from my heart, I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] has met the responsibilities that have been thrown upon him at this session of the House in the highest order. [Applause.] I believe that any investigation carried on by the Rules Committee under his chairmanship is going to be all-inclusive. Nothing will be covered up; and all of the facts, so far as possible, will be reported to the House.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. I desire to make the observation that the fact that when money is appropriated it does not mean that it will be expended. The gentleman will corroborate me in the statement that a year and a half ago the House appropriated $30,000 to assist the Military Affairs Committee in its investigation. I believe that investigation has already saved this country millions of dollars, and will continue to do so for a long time in the future. During that year and a half we have expended only $10,100, and we have $19,900 to return to the Treasury.

Mr. WARREN. Yes. The gentleman has been very conservative in the expenditure of those funds.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. PIERCE. I was on the floor and am one Member who voted for this appropriation. This is my second term. I cannot think of an appropriation I voted for with a clearer heart than this. One publication in New York has openly stated that a million dollars was spent on telegrams in 48 hours. The country wants to know why. It has been stated that more money was spent on this campaign than in any two Presidential campaigns. If so, we want to know where it came from. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. The position of the Committee on Accounts was that while all of us thought nothing is going to be accomplished by this investigation, we are not going to be placed in the position of withholding funds for an investigation that the House has already ordered.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WARREN. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Will this investigation include other lobbying activities?

Mr. WARREN. It is confined solely to activities on the recent power bill.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. I am sorry it does not include other lobbying activities.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I did not introduce this resolution. I have insisted from the beginning that the Senate committee make this investigation.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE] speaks of the hundreds of thousands of telegrams and letters that have poured in here, thousands of which were forged, and many of them signed under coercion. I for one am in favor of going to the bottom of this question, whether it is done by a House committee or a Senate committee. If a proper investigation is carried on, it is going to search the records of Congressmen as they have never been searched before.

I am going to suggest to the Chairman of the Rules Committee [Mr. O'CONNOR] that, owing to the criticism that he is receiving, owing to the friction that has arisen between him and those of us who are supporting the administration and who favor this investigation, those of us who favor the administration's policies on this entire power question, that this should be done through a subcommittee and that the gentleman from New York ought to appoint a subcommittee or else the House should give us a special committee to make this investigation. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I know of no friction between myself and the gentleman or anybody else.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, well, now——

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not know what the gentleman is talking about.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from New York knows that he denied us—he was Chairman of the Rules Committee—and he denied us an extra motion to recommit on the holding-company bill.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Denied whom?

Mr. RANKIN. The Members of the House.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Nobody asked for a second motion to recommit except the gentleman from Mississippi, and he, not a member of the reporting committee, had no authority to inject himself.

Mr. RANKIN. The administration did.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The administration did not ask me. It did not ask the Rules Committee.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, that is the gentleman's story.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman from Mississippi claims it did, but he has no authority whatever to make any such statement. All his authority is assumed and presumptious.

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I have some authority, too. The gentleman knows that. As a result of that, we had no direct vote on the main issue, and the country is literally seething with indignation as a result of what happened. [Laughter and applause.]

Do not you Republicans laugh; you will get it when you get back home. The people of this country are not going to be robbed in power rates or plundered through the sale of watered stocks and have such conduct carried on in the House as it was carried on last week without you hearing about it.

Another thing, we asked for two motions to recommit on the present bill. I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR] knew that the administration wanted it. He had that information, for I gave it to him myself. We are denied two motions to recommit now, which will probably prevent a roll call on the main issue. Mr. HILL of Alabama, a member of the Military Affairs Committee, and I both appeared before the Rules Committee and asked for two motions to recommit. There is criticism today of the way this investigation is being conducted, criticism of the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], if he wants to know, and I should like to see him either appoint a subcommittee to make this investigation or give us a special committee to make it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] has expired.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR]. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I have been a Member of this House for seven terms, and a member of the Rules Committee for seven terms. To have been placed upon this great committee when I first came to Congress was an honor that no previous Member ever received, and which I did not deserve. I did not seek it; it just so happened. During all my experience on this committee, whether under the chairmanship for 8 years of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] or under the chairmanship of our beloved leader, the late Mr. Pou, or under the chairmanship of our beloved majority leader today, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I have never until this morning heard any aspersions cast against the integrity of this committee on the floor of the House. I do not know whether I am to interpret what the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said as an aspersion on the committee or upon me personally. I prefer to interpret it as against me personally. If the gentleman so intended, it is the first time in 13 years that I have had to rise in my place on the floor in what might be termed a "defense" of myself, but I am ready to face any charges or aspersions now or any time in the future. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Mississippi reiterates what one chain of newspapers has said repeatedly in vicious and blackguard editorials concerning me about "two motions to recommit" on the utility bill. I have bored the House long enough in explaining the parliamentary situation as to that bill and proving that the editor did not know what he was writing and knew he did not, and how every opportunity was given for record votes within the rules of the House, or any reasonable rules which should govern any parliamentary body in the world. When the gentleman from Mississippi says, "We asked for two motions to recommit", he uses an editorial "we", because only one human being ever asked the Committee on Rules for two motions to recommit, and that was the gentleman from Mississippi, who is not even a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. When the gentleman states that the administration wanted two motions to recommit, and that he carried the message to Garcia, the Rules Committee, let me say to him that so long as I stay here I do not expect that the gentleman from Mississippi will ever be the liaison officer between the President and me or my committee. [Applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. The Rules Committee never sought this lobby investigation, as I have said before.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I refuse to yield.

Mr. RANKIN. All right.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has a habit of squirting himself into Members' speeches, but he is not going to squirt himself into my remarks, because I shall take the blue pencil and cross it right out if I see fit.

To repeat, the Rules Committee did not seek this investigation; the Rules Committee is busy enough without having extra duties placed upon it; but when this House twice, almost unanimously, directed that committee to conduct this investigation, it is our duty to do so, if the House sees fit that we continue. I do not have to stand here and speak in behalf of the 13 honorable men on the Rules Committee, or say for them that we are going to see this thing through so far as we can see it through. The House knows those men and has confidence in them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know that the investigation is going to require $50,000. Congress is not going to be in session, the Lord help us, for a few months at least at the end of this year, and then we could not get money if we needed it. We are going to delve into this power lobby; we are going faster and further than the gentleman from Mississippi or any other self-constituted champion of the "peepul" would ever go, we believe. [Applause.]

Why, I was fighting the Power Trust when I was in the Legislature of New York, long before this self-appointed champion of the "peepul" from Mississippi took up the fight principally in behalf of Tupelo. [Laughter.] I was interested in the power situation not alone in my own city and my own State but in the entire Nation. I never saw a power lobbyist here. We want to know who they are; we want to see how much money they spent on propaganda, entertainment, or in any other way. The people are entitled to know it.

I do not agree that these investigations do no good. While one may not be able to put one's finger on the exact tangible result, I believe they have a deterring effect throughout the country on questionable practices. Right now we are faced with an antilobbying bill. This investigation, I believe, whoever conducts it—and the Lord knows I do not welcome it—will have a very beneficial effect. It will expose whatever has been going on; and if this great House has confidence in its Rules Committee, I believe they will make this fund available to us to carry on what the House has mandated to us as our duty. [Applause.]

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] needs not to be reminded that I have a very deep affection for him and often find myself in accord with him in the position that he takes on public questions, but I do regret that he has made this unfavorable reference to the chairman of my committee. I can easily understand his anxiety for a thorough investigation of the question that has arisen on power lobbying.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman defer his request for just a minute?

Mr. RANKIN. Gladly.

Mr. COX. But his suspicion or his fear that the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], the chairman of the committee, will give direction to the labors of the committee that do not promise a thorough and honest investigation is altogether unfounded.

I have been on the committee for a good long while. I know the chairman and I think I am in his confidence. I know, as I believe my friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, knows, that the chairman, as well as the other members of the committee, are all honorable men, and that he can well afford to rely upon the assurance that the committee will meet their responsibilities in a proper manner; and, so far as the duties which this House puts upon them with respect to the proposed investigation are concerned, the members of the Rules Committee will perform their duties to the full extent of their ability.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KRAMER].

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Committee on Accounts and having served on a recent committee investigating un-American activities, I just want to give certain information for the benefit of the committee which will make this investigation. I do not see how they are going to spend $50,000 to make this investigation, because after Congress adjourns they will have no authority to compel the honoring of subpenas issued upon anyone who may choose to disrespect them. There is nothing in the law that compels the persons subpenaed to appear before the committee of the House of Representatives after service of the subpena in any State other than the District of Columbia. That was one of the things that the Committee on Un-American Activities ran into in their investigation. There is a bill now pending before the Judiciary Committee, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DICKSTEIN], changing the statute, which, if enacted, will enable the committee to function in such a way that they could take drastic action if a subpena issued was disobeyed.

The Special Committee on Un-American Activities, which carried on most of its activity subsequent to the adjournment of the second session of the Seventy-third Congress, on more than one occasion found itself seriously handicapped in its effort to compel testimony by its witnesses and to make effective subpenas issued requiring the production of pertinent books and other documents.

Then we found that, due to the fact that the Seventy-third Congress was not in session and would not again convene unless called into special session, there was no provision of the law by which we could compel attendance or compel production of the documents, nor could we bring proceedings against recalcitrant witnesses in contempt or have imposed upon them penalties provided by law for contempt. We found the reason was that the existing law required a report of the contempt of the House and then had to await action by the House upon the committee's recommendation regarding citations for contempt.

The matter was taken up with the district attorney of that district, to whom was submitted transcript of the examination and copy of the subpena issued, and his reply was to the effect that, inasmuch as the examination of the witness was not in the District of Columbia and the issue of the subpena had not taken place in the District of Columbia, he had no jurisdiction to present the matter to the Federal grand jury in his district. His explanation was, as I quote from his letter:

> I am still of the opinion that section 102 must be read in conjunction with 104 of the same title and that reading them together they confer no jurisdiction on the district court in this district to proceed either by the information or indictment against this witness. (Chapman 166 U. S. 601, 41 L. Ed. 1154.)

This is a concrete illustration of the difficulties of the investigating committee seeking to subpena witnesses outside of the District of Columbia during the recesses of Congress will experience.

I commend to your serious attention H. R. 5915, which seeks to clarify section 104 of the Revised Statutes of the United States so as to enlarge on the authority to conform to the requirements of the investigating committees whose authorization carries them to distant parts of the United States and Territories thereof.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GREENWOOD], and after that I shall move the previous question.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question? The statement was made here a while ago——

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I did not yield. If I have some time left at the end of my statement, I shall be glad to yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. Speaker, it seems that a little feeling has unnecessarily developed on this occasion, although I cannot see where the pending investigation calls for any such feeling. The Rules Committee has assumed this responsibility because the House has placed it upon the committee. I have the highest respect for its chairman, having served with him for several years on that committee. The gentleman from Mississippi has always been a good friend of mine and I have confidence in him.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield since he has mentioned my name?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I do not yield. I do not think there is anything the gentleman needs to ask a question about since I have acknowledged our friendship.

Mr. RANKIN. I am not questioning the integrity of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to complete my statement.

As in every investigation, this committee knew nothing more about the ramifications of the investigation than the House itself. Of course, we have no fixed program, but it will develop from time to time. We have started with the episodes that have already been called to the attention of the House. From time to time we will go into other features and other ramifications that will come to the attention of the committee. I am sure there is not a member of that commitee who desires to spend one dollar more of this appropriation than is necessary, but we do feel the responsibility is upon us to make a thorough investigation. Every Member of Congress will be given an opportunity to appear before the committee and offer any suggestion or testimony which they desire to offer. I believe this resolution should be passed without question. I am sure there is no feeling that the Rules Committee will in any way evade any of its responsibilities, or will attempt to do anything except to make a thorough investigation, which the House expects them to make, and report their findings back to the House. I know that is the feeling of the chairman of the committee. I think we should have this amount of money made available, if we find it necessary to use it, and I feel sure that not a dollar of it will be spent that is not necessary.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from North Carolina to give me a couple of minutes? I think I am entitled to that time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read the committee amendment to the resolution.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8632, with Mr. DRIVER in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the committee just a bit of information as to exactly what the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama means.

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAVERICK. The gentleman is not speaking to his motion but is speaking to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] debate on which has been closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is overruled. The gentleman from Kentucky will proceed.

Mr. MAY. The enacting clause of this bill states: "Be it enacted, so-and-so." This is a part of the "so-and-so."

Mr. Chairman, it appeared in evidence before our committee that under the Federal Water Power Act, by which the War Department has jurisdiction of the rivers and harbors of this country, about 30 years ago they granted to some corporation which now belongs to the American Aluminum Co.—and if you want to say so, to Andrew W. Mellon—an area of about 40,000 acres on the Little Tennessee River, which area is 85 miles from the Norris Dam. In the 30 years these people have been in there they have established a large number of industrial plants and built three dams at a cost of $40,000,000. That company proposes to build one dam above the other three to perform a function similar to that the Government intends to perform by the building of the Norris Dam above the Wilson Dam.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will my distinguished friend yield?

Mr. MAY. Not now.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I want to give the gentleman some information that will make him happy.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I cannot yield now. I would yield if I had time. Not only have they spent $40,000,000 down there and given steady employment to thousands at good wages for all these years, but they pay 97 percent of all the taxes paid in one county and over 85 percent of all the taxes paid in another county, and they furnish 4 months of school in every district school, in every graded school in every year in those two counties.

These people, in order to provide a reservoir, bought 9,000 acres out of 10,000 at about $15 an acre, and were preparing to construct a great storage dam to facilitate the operations of their great industrial plants and regulate floods and increase power production. All the last quarter of a century this private industry, without a penny's cost to the Government, meeting wage pay rolls every 2 weeks for the last 20 years amounting to hundreds of thousands every month, and at the same time paying large amounts of taxes to Federal, State, and local governments and schools, has moved steadily and progressively forward. All at once this T. V. A. crowd, like a band of high-seas pirates, sought to completely block the entire program by placing the vicious heel of autocracy upon the neck of this great revenue-producing enterprise and crush it forever and thus put out of employment some 6,000 workmen and remove millions of property from taxation.

They bought one plot of land 30 feet by 50 feet at the rate of $5,000 per acre. They bought another plot of land in the middle of the same reservoir consisting of 12 acres at the rate of $300 per acre and called them national parks, public lands not subject to condemnation.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to enable the Tennessee Valley Authority to block that entire program and dictate to this industry that is paying a large amount of taxes to municipalities, counties, school districts, and the Federal Government, and prohibit them from proceding with that improvement. That is what I call infamy plus Federal bureaucracy. A bunch of land sharks. I want the membership of this House who did not know about the hearings of this committee to know that they are voting absolutely to exterminate an industry that pays taxes and in the interest of one that does not pay a dime of taxes. President Andrew Jackson built the United States Treasury square across Pennsylvania Avenue to thwart exactly the same kind of a set of Washington land sharks in 1832, and there stands the people's Treasury now. Oh, for another Andrew Jackson. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, just before the Committee rose yesterday evening the argument had gotten down to the point where the question was raised with respect to my attitude on this measure. I have tried repeatedly to state it and I shall state it tersely this morning in this way. There is a certain Book that all of us know about or should know about which says, "Between two evils choose ye the least." I am taking the House committee bill as the least of two evils as between it and the original basic act under which the T. V. A. is operating, and as I have repeatedly stated, if my committee bill is not deleted of its valuable provisions I shall vote for it, otherwise I shall vote against it.

I think this is a much better measure, but my particular purpose in asking for this time this morning was to respond to some of the statements of my good friend from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] made yesterday evening about the coal business in my district, and since he has been hauled over the coals so strongly this morning I want to assure him in the beginning that what I shall say today is said simply as an explanation and not as a criticism.

It was stated that the coal in my district was being wasted and should be used at the mine to produce electricity in order that my coal miners might have lights by which to read and heat with which to warm themselves and provide a number of the other conveniences which electricity gives. I wish every human being on earth could have all the conveniences of electricity without cost, but I must remind the statesman from Tupelo that there is not a miner in my district that eats or wears electricity. May I say that I know every coal mine in my district. I know every coal operator in my district. I do not know the 30,000 coal laborers that are in my district personally, but they know me, every one of them, and they are all for me, too—Republicans and Democrats. [Applause.] In my district every coal camp is lighted with electricity. In every five-room house, plastered and wired for electricity, electricity is furnished by the coal company on a reasonable flat rate per month, and every miner in my district has the privilege of running an iron, a refrigerator, keeping cold beer, if he can get it, lights burning in five rooms all day and all night, if he wants to, at a flat rate of $2 a month in most cases.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I cannot yield just now. I want to get this statement in the RECORD.

In addition to this, the best of feeling exists between the operator and the miner, and I want now to go to Ontario to refer to some of the supposed low rates that has become an obsession of the brain with this distinguished statesman.

According to the latest figures from an investigation of the Ontario enterprise, that has been so much extolled in distributing electricity as a Government-operated institution by some uninformed gentlemen, when they closed their operations for the year 1933 they lacked $4,221,000 having as much money as the amount they had expended to produce and market the electricity. They started off at an estimated cost of plant of $25,000,000 and landed with an actual investment of $80,000,000. The Province of Ontario, in its whole operation, started out with combined liabilities of $25,000,000 and landed with $316,000,000, which is equivalent to $500 for every consumer in the Province.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 20 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Just as soon as I finish this statement.

The $316,000,000 of combined liabilities of the Province of Ontario is equivalent to $500 for each consumer they have, and 6-percent interest on $500 used to be $30 a year, or two and a half dollars a month of fixed charges. Therefore, the enterprise, publicly operated, is a rank failure and a misrepresentation [applause], like Tacoma, Wash., where they say they have a low rate, but the property tax rate is $7.20 on $100 worth of property, and this goes into the expense of operating the plant, and the revenues thus derived aid in running the city government that is crushed by heavy outstanding bond issues.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is entirely wrong about that. The Tacoma plant is entirely separate from the city administration. It is a nonprofit-sharing corporation, and it has nothing to do with the tax rates in the city of Tacoma. This was thoroughly explained by the Senator from Washington in his speech in the Senate the other day, and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LLOYD] will tell you the same thing, and he lives in Tacoma.

Mr. MAY. Now, Mr. Chairman, in answer to that statement, Mr. E. K. Murray, director of the department of public works of Tacoma, Wash., who represents the whole State, testified before the House Military Affairs Committee on April 15, 1933, and stated in detail the facts in relation to this matter, when Senator BONE was present. I asked him these questions:

Mr. MAY. I want to get this clear. Is the 72 mills per dollar or per hundred dollars' worth?

Mr. MURRAY. It is 72 mills on the dollar.

Mr. MAY. That would be how much on $100?

Mr. MURRAY. It would be $7.20. The tax is levied on 50 percent of the actual value of the property.

This is another one of the many instances where government ownership and operation of public utilities becomes a farce and a failure. Lower rates to consumers are urged as the great goal to be obtained, and yet the public pays the bills in the form of higher taxes to take care of extravagance due to bureaucratic and political control of such enterprises; but, Mr. Speaker, I have opposed the Tennessee Valley Authority from the beginning upon a more fundamental principle than mere reduction of rates of service. The principal objection to such an institution as T. V. A. is founded upon the principle that it is contrary to the principle of local self-government, and the doctrine of State rights, both of which are foundation stones of self-government, and individual liberty under a republican form of government. As to what the founders of the Republic meant in the strong restriction of powers granted by the States to the Federal Government, can better be determined by reference to the views of some of the men whose public careers followed soon after the establishment of the Federal Government.

In the great debate between Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, and the illustrious Robert Y. Haynes, of South Carolina, in 1830 when they had under discussion in the United States Senate the Foote resolution which proposed to cede to the States portions of the public lands then owned by the Government, that great Southern statesman and leader, Robert Y. Haynes, expressed grave concern at the influence that might be wielded upon the freedom of the States, and the people thereof, by merely ceding to them portions of the public domain. In that debate he used language peculiarly applicable to present-day conditions. I quote him as follows:

I distrust, therefore, sir, the policy of creating a great permanent National Treasury, whether to be derived from public lands or from any other source. If I had, sir, the powers of a magician, and could, by a wave of my hand, convert this Capitol into gold for such a purpose, I would not do it. If I could, by a mere act of my will, put at the disposal of the Federal Government any amount of treasure which I might think proper to name, I should limit the amount to the means necessary for the legitimate purposes of the Government. Sir, an immense National Treasury would be a fund for corruption. It would enable Congress and the Executive to exercise a control over States as well as over great interests in the country, nay, even over corporations and individuals—utterly destructive of the purity, and fatal to the duration of our institutions. It would be equally fatal to the sovereignty and independence of the States.

Sir, I am one of those who believe that the very life of our system is the independence of the States, and that there is no evil more to be deprecated than the consolidation of this Government. It is only by a strict adherence to the limitations imposed by the Constitution on the Federal Government, that this system works well, and can answer the great ends for which it was instituted. I am opposed, therefore, in any shape, to all unnecessary extension of the powers, or the influence of the Legislature or Executive of the Union over the States or the people of the States; and most of all, I am opposed to those partial distributions of favors whether by legislation or appropriation which has a direct and powerful tendency to spread corruption through the land; to create an abject spirit of dependence; to the different portions of the Union, and finally to sap the very foundations of the Government itself.

These words are particularly applicable at this time when we find the Tennessee Valley Authority's board of directors engaged in every form of activity, and planning every possible scheme to subsidize and subdue the people of four great southern States. I have never had any objection, and do not today oppose the full development of the Tennessee River for flood control and navigation, but I do object to the activities of this Federal bureau in a reckless and wasteful expenditure of public moneys in order to control and dictate the policies of the States in which they operate, and to direct the life and activities of the people of those States.

If it was dangerous in the early existence of the Republic to cede to the States public lands within their territory, how much more dangerous is it today to have the Federal Government appropriating hundreds of millions of dollars to be given to municipalities and other subdivisions of State government in the form of grants for the construction of power plants and distribution system for the distribution and sale of electric power, when the Tennessee Valley Authority assumes the right and power to dictate to each and every community the terms of sale and the activities of their local city, town, and village. The Federal Government has become so all-powerful that it is dominating the States to such an extent that all eyes are turned toward Washington. Bureaucrats at the heads of great departments with more than $4,000,000,000 of taxpayers' money readily available for gifts, donations, and other forms of bribery, has developed a condition where the governors of States, as well as the departments of State governments are being told from Washington what they may or may not do in the management of their own internal affairs.

It is proposed by this legislation and by amendments to be offered to this bill that the Tennessee Valley Authority be permitted to engage promiscuously in the wholesale and retail distribution of electricity in competition with private owners, and to effectuate the desires of this organization, any city, town, or municipality, or cooperative organization of citizens who will apply to the Tennessee Valley Authority, may procure an outright gift or donation of funds from the Federal Treasury of 45 percent of the cost of the enterprise. This is not merely the open door to a vicious form of State socialism, but it is despotism in its vilest form. This, to me, is unthinkable, but we are told, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States desires to establish a yardstick by which to measure the cost of electricity to the consumer, and this yardstick is to be produced by authorizing the Federal agency that is to make it, to sell electricity at any price it wishes. It is proposed to expressly authorize the sale at any figure below cost. Of course, so long as taxpayers may be fleeced for money to take up deficits, the Government can operate such a program, but how long, may I ask, can a private industry compete with such opposition?

Deficits created by the operation of private concerns must be provided for either from existing surpluses, if any there be, or by assessments upon stockholders, and ultimately this can result only in bankruptcy and ultimate destruction of all industry by ruthless competition by the Government. It has been argued upon the floor of this House that I have been trying to throttle and defeat the purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority, when, as a matter of fact, I have sought only to place upon its board of directors, officials, and agents, the same restrictions that are required of other Government agencies and bureaus, and to require it to account for all moneys received by it as other agencies of the Government do. To these things, the directors of the T. V. A. seriously object, and their objection to this leads to no reasonable or logical conclusion other than they desire to recklessly handle the peoples' money. In the face of the most unheard of extravagance in Government that can be pointed to in the history of the world, if it be a crime to demand economy in the expenditure of public money, then I plead guilty of the charge. If it be a crime to demand that those who spend the public funds shall make an honest accounting for them, then I plead guilty on the second count.

All I have asked or demanded is that if we must have a T. V. A., let us have a controlled T. V. A., and not one with unlimited and uncontrolled authority to spend the people's money. If we are to have a yardstick, let us have an honest yardstick, and a fair yardstick, but, Mr. Speaker, the whole purpose and object is to so cripple, compete with, and destroy private industries that they may be taken over, owned, controlled, and operated by the Federal Government.

I have been charged as being interested in the coal industry and therefore prejudiced against the T. V. A. I have no personal interest in coal or the coal industry, other than the interest of the people, owners and workers, engaged in the industry in the district which I represent. I have, in my district, a high-grade bituminous coal, and at this point I desire to include in my remarks a table showing the number of miners employable, the number unemployed, and the number employed on full time and part time, together with their average earnings per year, in the various counties.

County	Employable miners	Unemployed	Employed full time	Employed part time	Average earnings per year
Floyd	4,295	----------	3,577	4,039	$929.20
Johnson	1,729	207	817	1,522	539.40
Knott	689	15	557	674	869.40
Letcher	5,389	147	4,983	5,242	800.00
Martin	397	10	299	387	542.80
Perry	5,389	319	4,511	5,070	839.20
Pike	6,238	298	4,923	5,940	878.60
Magoffin	175	40	115	135	441.60
Total	24,301	1,036	19,782	23,009	----------

Also another table showing the number of miners employed full time each year and the amount of their earnings.

Floyd	$929.20	× 3,577	miners =	$3,323,748.40
Pike	878.60	× 4,923	miners =	4,325,347.80
Knott	869.40	× 557	miners =	484,255.80
Perry	839.20	× 4,511	miners =	3,785,631.20
Letcher	800.00	× 4,983	miners =	3,986,400.00
Johnson	539.40	× 817	miners =	440,689.80
Martin	542.80	× 299	miners =	172,297.20
Magoffin	441.60	× 115	miners =	50,784.00
				16,549,544.20

From these tables, it will be observed that there are approximately 25,000 workers in the eight counties of my district and that they earn annually in wages more than $16,000,000. It will doubtless be admitted by everyone who is informed at all that electricity is one of the strong competitors of coal as a fuel, and that if we are to have a subsidized Government-owned electrical industry, authorized and permitted to sell electricity at any price, in view of the testimony in this record, what may be expected to happen in the coal industry of my district, and where, oh where, Mr. Speaker, can we find employment for the 25,000 men that will be thrown out of employment, and what will take the place of the $16,000,000 annual pay rolls in the coal industry of my district? I am interested and shall oppose to the last the vicious, ruthless, and destructive competition in the coal industry as proposed by this legislation. I do this, Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the workers and all the people of my district. The $16,000,000 spent annually by the workers in the coal mines of my district means business to the merchants, farmers, and all other forms of business, and happiness and contentment to the toilers who produce the wealth and earn the wages.

While I recognize my obligation to all the people of the Nation, I am particularly the representative of my own district, and with this vital interest at stake, I shall continue to oppose any obstruction to the welfare and to the life and prosperity of my constituency.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, having been unable to obtain any time during the general debate on the measure before us, I am availing myself of this parliamentary expediency to make a few remarks on this very important piece of legislation.

Naturally I am tremendously interested in the work of the T. V. A. First, because of the national-defense, flood-control, and navigation aspects of the proposition; and, second, because of the fact that one of its major activities is located in the congressional district I have the honor to represent. The first element of my interest, therefore, is based on principle and patriotic impulses, while the second, as you will readily perceive, is founded on more or less selfish considerations.

This subject, Mr. Chairman, is by no means a new one to me. Coming to this body in 1919, I have had the opportunity to observe this problem in all of its details and ramifications during the intervening years, and I have enjoyed the privilege of participating in its extremely difficult and complicated but gradual solution. During that period I have been out of harmony with my party in the main, but I have no apologies to offer to anyone for the position I have invariably taken and the votes I have uniformly cast. While this development is in the South, it is by no means a local or provincial one. It is a preeminently national project and institution, and the time will soon come when it will be so recognized, even as the Panama Canal, the Boulder Dam, and other great national developments are considered.

As a general proposition, I am opposed to the philosophy of Government ownership and Government operation, but inasmuch as our navigable streams belong to the whole people, I favor their preservation as far as possible free from the exploitation of private greed.

Mr. Chairman, I am not one of those who nourish a grudge against the private-utility interests of this country, and who would destroy them by one fell swoop. I recognize the contribution that these enterprises have made to our national wealth, and I am violently opposed to the ruthless confiscation of their investments. I voted against the so-called "death sentence" a few days ago, because I believe in justice to every individual and to every enterprise. But, Mr. Chairman, I am constrained to believe that many of these utility companies have in the past imposed unreasonable and exorbitant rates for their services. I do know that since the birth of the T. V. A., charges for electrical current have been sharply reduced in my State and in adjoining States, and I understand that the repercussion from the T. V. A. policy has been similarly felt throughout the length and breadth of the land. The T. V. A. is certainly entitled to credit for this great blessing to the people.

The Tennessee Valley development envisions a gigantic civic laboratory dedicated to the welfare of the people of the United States. And if it is not handicapped in its endeavors and is permitted to carry to fruition its high purposes, it will inevitably turn out to be one of the greatest and most valuable assets, both from a civic and economic consideration of our Nation. During the hearings and the debate on this measure, the Authority has been the target of much satire, much abuse, and much ridicule. This is not strange, and it is certainly not uncommon. No undertaking of such colossal magnitude has escaped criticism, merited or otherwise. Constructive criticism is often a good thing and should be encouraged, but criticism which partakes of captiousness, sectional prejudice, and bigotry is always unfortunate.

Of course, the Authority has been guilty of indiscretions, and I am frank to say that I do not condone or approve of all of its practices, but I certainly would not favor the junking of a great national enterprise such as this just because the Authority has shown some evidence of poor judgment, the effect of which pales into insignificance in comparison with the tremendous magnitude of the undertaking.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. McSWAIN. Reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I desire to say that we want to finish this bill today, and if we can get down to it we can finish it. A few minutes longer under a pro forma amendment should be sufficient. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. The acts of indiscretion about which some of my colleagues complain will soon pass and be forgotten, while the beneficent influences of this great development will go on increasing in usefulness as the years go by. And in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make this prophecy that before many years shall lapse those who have so bitterly assailed and anathematized this project will recognize its virtue and will rise up and call "blessed" those who have been responsible for the fulfillment and realization of a great national vision and aspiration. [Applause.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, during this debate I have heard a great deal of personalities and some statements about coal. What has coal got to do with the T. V. A.? I come from the State of Texas and I have not mentioned oil up to this time. But Texas is the greatest oil-producing State in the United States, and my district and my State wants the whole United States to be prosperous. If we other States can be prosperous by the use of any of their wealth and resources, we will sell more oil. The same thing is true of coal; the same thing is true of any product. I do not believe that by stopping prosperity in a few States you can help prosperity in the coal States or anywhere else. We have stopped producing many things, making them scarcer in order to bring about prosperity. That is ridiculous. We are talking about small matters and about false economy. Prosperity begets prosperity, just as poverty begets poverty. They keep talking about those cows, which are an infinitesimal part of the great program. Yet, as a matter of fact, if you get good cows down there and raise the type of cattle similar to the cattle they have in Minnesota and Wisconsin, it will be a fine thing for this country—and I disagree with my friend the gentleman from Tennessee that his State is as great a dairying State as either Minnesota or Wisconsin. If the coal people want protective legislation to help their industry, I am going to be for it; and if any other industry in this country wants protective legislation I will be for that, too. What we ought to do is to be for every measure of conservation and for every move for prosperity in the country.

On the utility holding-company bill, as I said the other day, we Democrats, at least, did not vote unanimously. We did not vote unanimously on the so-called "death sentence", but I do hope the Democratic Party will go down the line and vote for the amendments offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], which are approved by the administration, and which will make the bill similar to the Senate bill, because the Republicans have made that an issue—it is in the paper this morning—that the T. V. A. is "communism" and "socialism." There is one thing the Democrats ought to do. We ought to have intelligence enough, if we are going to run our Government and the T. V. A. intelligently, to give such units as the T. V. A. somewhere near as much latitude as we gave the holding companies. Let us go ahead and conduct our own business intelligently so that we can be proud of it, and let us not knock the President in the nose twice.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I am in a happy frame of mind today, because I believe that the bill under discussion is in the interest of the American people and I am glad to join in its support. We heard the T. V. A. referred to on the floor yesterday as a project which will furnish a "yardstick" for legitimate utility rates throughout the country.

I am interested in that idea, and I should like to apply it also in other fields. We need a yardstick by which to evaluate the imperative needs of our people and to disclose the disgraceful contrast between the privileged few and the underprivileged many. Yesterday I received a letter from the superintendent of charities of the county of Los Angeles, in reply to a communication I addressed to him regarding the pathetic plight of a 70-year-old gentleman just recovering from an operation which he underwent last month. In his letter, the superintendent of charities stated:

Investigation discloses that Mrs. ——— is receiving welfare relief in the amount of $7.14 per month and Mr. ——— in the amount of $13.82 per month. This sum is $5.28 in excess of the ordinary budget for one in this circumstance.

In other words, this aged, worthy couple is receiving less than $21 per month welfare relief which, it is pointed out, is $5.28 in excess of the ordinary budget for such cases.

Speaking further, the superintendent of charities states:

This family is a very high type, and cooperative in every way.

I ask now the special attention of the members of the Military Affairs Committee who are handling the bill under discussion. The Military Affairs Committee recently reported out a bill—S. 1404—a so-called "Army officers' promotion bill", which is a distinct raid on the Treasury of the United States.

If the Members will refer to page 10346 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD they will find some startling facts, facts in reference to the high pay and other advantages enjoyed by the officers of the Regular Army who are asking for further increases for themselves, while worthy, outstanding American citizens are forced to subsist on the meager funds available to them through relief agencies.

With a background of 37 years' military experience, active and retired, I contend that any legislation which seeks to retire able-bodied graduates from West Point after they have served 11 years in the Army, as does S. 1404, is nothing short of criminal. To retire officers in the Army, contrary to existing law, with retired pay from $149 to $362 per month is an absolutely unjustifiable raid on the Treasury, and is class legislation of the worst type. I again urge the Members to read my remarks on this subject on page 10346 of the RECORD.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is speaking out of order. He is not speaking to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that the gentleman is not confining himself to the bill. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that the gentleman has made a point of order to stop discussion of a matter so threatening to the interests of the American taxpayers. It is part of the plan of the selfish military lobby in Washington that the Members should not realize the tremendous significance of S. 1404, both economically and socially, and, as a military man myself, whose allegiance, however, is first of all to the people and the Government of our country, I feel it is my duty to urge the Members to give this proposed legislation their earnest consideration so that this flagrant raid on the Treasury may be stopped before it goes further.

The Army and Navy lobbies here in Washington are of more potential force than the so-called "utility lobby" which we are now investigating. A newspaper correspondent yesterday advised me how diligently the Army lobbyists are working to secure the enactment of S. 1404, and I myself have been approached from various sources, even including the families of officers, with requests that I not oppose S. 1404, which will be an inordinate steal because of the cumulative, perpetual expense it will mean for the taxpayer, due to an unnecessary increase in rank of 1,412 field officers and the authority to retire up to 4,500 able-bodied officers after having served only 15 years. The Members might realize the strength of the military lobby if all officers, active and retired, were required to wear their uniforms while on duty in Washington or residing here. Such a requirement, in my opinion, would be distinctly in the interest of sound legislation.

Mr. MERRITT of New York. Mr. Chairman, I insist the gentleman is speaking out of order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. I am speaking for the American taxpayers, and I ask the Committee to bear this in mind.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California will suspend. After being directed to confine his remarks to the bill, he should proceed in order.

Mr. HOEPPEL. In reference to S. 1404, I consider that I have said enough. I only hope the Members will read my discussion of the subject in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 10346, and if they are human and honestly interested in the taxpayers and in alleviating the desperate plight of the worthy citizen, who has been unemployed for a long period and who is on relief, I feel confident they will vote against S. 1404 if it is brought before the House for consideration. Now, in reference to the pending measure before the House——

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. I am sorry, I have not the time. I wish to reiterate that I am in favor of this T. V. A. legislation. This bill is one of the outstanding points of the new deal. If we would appropriate billions of dollars to develop every natural waterway in America for the purpose of water conservation, for flood control, and for the development of electricity, we would save our basic natural resources of hard and bituminous coal which are being depleted unnecessarily and which will be so vitally required by posterity in the centuries ahead of us.

We are here quibbling over the expenditure of a few million dollars for a worth-while project which has for its objective flood control, water conservation, and the furnishing of electricity at the lowest possible cost to the consumers, not only in the section to be served, but everywhere in the United States, for the T. V. A. is to furnish a yardstick for reasonable prices to all consumers. I hope that we will be equally solicitous of the taxpayers' interest in the event the so-called "officers' promotion bill" reaches the floor for consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

ONTARIO, ITS TROUBLE—THE POWER TRUST

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] will give me his attention for just a minute. I want to get him straight on the Ontario proposition; and just to keep the RECORD straight on the Ontario project, I trust that the membership of the House will read my remarks on that question, in which I quote the official records of the Ontario project, in the RECORD on page 8168 of the RECORD of May 24. Somehow or other there are quite a few newspapers ready, anxious, and willing to uphold the rights of the Power Trust and their excessive charges running into about $1,000,000,000 per year they place on the consumer beyond rates that are considered fair rates. And these papers, probably because they either own Power Trust stock or because of the advertising the power companies carry in their papers, are always ready and willing to carry whatever editorials or news items the Power Trust wants them to carry in their paper. Of late I have noticed quite a few such newspapers ready and willing to do the bidding of the Power Trust and to help them any way they can. When I read the editorial of the New York Sun, I went to the trouble to get the facts for the RECORD to answer the editorial placed in the RECORD by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], this particular editorial appearing in the New York Sun on April 22, 1935, attacking this Ontario project. I think this article clearly answers him; and if the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] will take the time to read that statement in the RECORD, he will find that the Ontario project is the greatest and one of the most successfully operated municipally owned projects today on the North American Continent. That great project is serving 757 cities and towns. It has an investment of more than $394,000,000, with an overhead indebtedness of 39 percent.

That indebtedness is not watered like the Power Trust pumps water into every project they start and then bleed the people white through the sale of worthless securities.

In recent years that indebtedness of the Ontario plant has been decreased from 88 percent to 39 percent. It is paying their people dividends in services rendered and making money. It is reducing its overhead every day.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. In just a moment. The only trouble the hydroelectric project of Ontario has had is the same trouble that every municipally owned plant in this country has had whenever they try to declare their independence from the Power Trust and set up their own plant. The Power Trust of this country, as you know, comes in and tries in every possible way to keep them from setting up and operating their own plant. They could not compete with the Ontario project, so they did the next best thing. They got to the officials over there, the same as they do the officials all over the United States whenever and wherever possible, and they got those officials to enter into three improvident and fraudulent contracts to buy power from private plants instead of continuing their policy of generating their own power. When the depression hit them they naturally had more power than they ever needed. That is the only trouble they ever had. One of those contracts was with the Quebec Power Co. for 250,000 horsepower; another was with another private company for 96,000 horsepower; and the third contract was with another private company for 125,000 horsepower. That is the only trouble the Ontario project has ever had, when the officials of that project were taken in, so to speak, by the Power Trust. Then the Power Trust came in through the back door to wreck it like they try to wreck every other municipal project everywhere. The Power Trust works every way and any way in the world to keep any government authority from having sufficient authority to regulate their rates, so that they may continue to charge the people excessive rates.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFARLANE. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I would like to ask the gentleman, who is a lawyer and a good one, what he thinks about the constitutional authority of the Federal Government to sell and distribute electricity within the sovereign State of Tennessee?

Mr. McFARLANE. Well, whenever some cannot think of any other excuse for voting against a bill they always like to set up a straw man and go to shooting at him on constitutional questions; they then go to alibiing along that line as their reason for their vote.

Mr. MAY. Is the straw man the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. McFARLANE. No. The straw man is the Power Trust that they hit upon whenever they try to jump over on constitutional grounds as reasons for their vote against the rights of the common people.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. McFARLANE] has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY], with reference to the Tacoma tax rate, that the Tacoma power plant is a separate, non-profit-sharing corporation. It has nothing to do with city taxes and, therefore, is not responsible for them. Its operating expenses, sinking fund, and overhead are paid for out of power revenues.

Now, about this yardstick. I hold in my hand a report from the engineers of the War Department made in 1930. It is signed by the then Secretary of War, Patrick J. Hurley, and by the Chief of Engineers, Gen. Lytle Brown.

This report of the Army engineers says they can manufacture power for 1.35 mills per kilowatt-hour and transmit it 250 miles for 1.11 mills per kilowatt-hour. Listen to this. This is from the report of the War Department. I learned long ago that whether you agree with the engineers of the War Department or not, they will tell you the truth. They will not lie. This is what the War Department says, and you gentlemen who have been talking about this yardstick listen to this, from pages 530 and 531, Report From the Chief of Engineers on the Tennessee River and Tributaries, Part 1, 1930 (H. Doc. No. 328, 71st Cong., 2d sess.):

> The next step is to estimate the transmission costs, including line losses of the hydro power. To supply the prospective market under consideration, it is estimated that the average transmission distance would be 250 miles, and based upon transmission-cost data worked up in the Nashville office, a copy of which constitutes a part of appendix G, section C, of this report, this would be 1.118 mills per kilowatt-hour, including line losses.
> Having the average cost of hydro power at the switchboard, and the average cost of transmission over the average distance, 1.358 plus 1.118 equals 2.476 mills per kilowatt-hour, equals the average cost of the hydro power delivered at an average distance of 250 miles.

Answer that! There it shows what it costs to produce this power and to transmit it 250 miles.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No; I cannot.

Mr. McFARLANE. Cover the tax phase of it.

Mr. RANKIN. The Tacoma plant paid $145,000 taxes last year, and the T. V. A. pays 5 percent of its gross earnings in lieu of taxes.

I have in my hand a report for the Power Authority of the State of New York, which shows that with an 80-percent load they can produce this power and transmit it 300 miles for 3.25 mills per kilowatt-hour.

The trouble is, gentlemen, you have not studied this proposition. The power lobbyists have been humbugging you and hoodwinking you. The Members of Congress and the American people are just now finding out what electric power is worth. When General Hurley signed this report the Power Trust was buying power at Muscle Shoals at 2 mills per kilowatt-hour, which the Army engineers say was produced at about 1⅓ mills per kilowatt-hour or less. This power they were buying for 2 mills at the dam they were selling 200 yards away at 10 cents a kilowatt-hour, or at a profit of 4,850 percent. You heard no complaint then, but now it is different. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired under the limitation fixed by the House.

Without objection, the pro forma amendments will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 6. That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto a proviso as follows: "Provided further, That the Board is authorized to include in any contract for the sale of power such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, and to provide for such rules and regulations as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes of this act, and in case the purchaser shall fail to comply with any such terms and conditions, or violate any such rules and regulations, said contract may provide that it shall be voidable at the election of the Board: Provided further, That in order to supply farms and small villages with electric power directly from its transmission lines as contemplated by this section, the Board in its discretion shall have power to acquire existing transmission lines and facilities: And provided further, That the terms 'States', 'counties', and 'municipalities' as used in this act shall be construed to include the public agencies of any of them unless the context requires a different construction."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: Page 5, line 7, strike out all of section 6 and insert in lieu thereof the following language:
> "SEC. 6. That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto a proviso as follows: 'Provided further, That the Board is authorized to include in any contract for the sale of power such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, and to provide for such rules and regulations as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes of this act, and in case the purchaser shall fail to comply with any such terms and conditions, or violate any such rules and regulations, said contract may provide that it shall be voidable at the election of the Board: Provided further, That in order to supply farms and small villages with electric power directly as contemplated by this section, the Board in its discretion shall have power to acquire existing electric facilities used in serving such farms and small villages: And provided further, That the terms "States", "counties", and "municipalities" as used in this act shall be construed to include the public agencies of any of them unless the context requires a different construction.'"

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, those who followed the reading of the amendment and compared it with the text of the bill will realize that the amendment proposes to change only two words, to wit, to strike out the words "transmission lines" and to insert in lieu thereof the words "electric facilities", so that, instead of reading "acquiring transmission lines and facilities", it will read "may acquire existing electric facilities." The word "facilities" is a little broader, Mr. Chairman. It is thought perhaps it might be desirable to acquire such things as transformers or step-down stations to reduce the voltage to make it usable by the farmers. The amendment is merely a clarifying amendment. I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SMITH of Virginia). The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, a few moments ago I was very much interested in the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MCFARLANE], in which he was praising the public-owned electric utilities in Canada, and especially in the Province of Ontario. There are a great many people in our country who continually are holding out the great advantage the people of Canada have in regard to public ownership of utilities, and especially in the Province of Ontario. I have in my hand part of an editorial published in the Ontario News Herald on December 19, 1934, from which I quote the following:

Take the Dominion's railway and merchant marine ownership policies—classic examples of the blight and burden of "politics in business."

Take the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario. Sitting right on the top of Niagara's power, it ought to be a marvelous success if there were any virtue in public ownership.

Instead of that its members have been kicked out and a newspaperman, dragged out of retirement to run it, has shocked even its stanchest friends by the revelations he has made of its deficiencies—and worse.

Now, that comes from one of the leading newspapers in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I feel a good deal like a man attending a medicine show such as we have in Oklahoma, where a tonic or linament is sold with the assurance that it will cure all evils that may exist in a man's system and that it may be used with equal efficacy as a horse medicine, chicken medicine, or for any other purpose. I am not supposed to know anything about the T. V. A. I cannot bandy these figures about rates back and forth; but I did have the privilege of visiting the Norris Dam. I also had the privilege of going to that town and seeing the dam under construction. I have been a farmer all my life. My father and my grandfather before me were engaged in the same occupation; and when I heard the gentleman from Mississippi tell of the wonders that are to come from the lighting of the homes, I felt like asking, How is electricity, and that product only, to change the whole economic status of the country? You must have something on which to use electricity. The territory I saw around Norris actually would not support goats.

I do not know whether the whole Tennessee Valley looks like it or not. The yards of the beautiful city that was constructed as a dream to lead the way for this Nation had to have earth hauled in so that grass could grow in the yards of a good many homes down there.

Mr. Chairman, we are considered to be hiding behind the Power Trust if we oppose the appropriation of millions of dollars for this dream to rehabilitate a country that has worn out. When we come to the Congress and ask aid in refinancing and amortizing the loans on the farms in the West, as provided in the Frazier-Lemke bill, we are Communists and have no place in the Congress. We have people out there who are actual farmers and can produce the grain and have produced it in the past. We have no need for electricity as yet. If we could finance our farms, have machinery at a reasonable cost to operate, and have some kind of homes to live in we would be perfectly happy.

Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the development of a model plant in T. V. A.; I am not opposed to continuing the work that has started down there, but there is not a private industry in the United States that could refinance themselves for an additional extension on the record that has been so far established by the T. V. A. They would have a mighty hard time getting their present indebtedness refinanced in order to carry on.

If this Congress wants to protect its authority and rights the Members will vote today that every cent that goes to the T. V. A., whether it is through the issuance of bonds or through an appropriation, should be authorized by the Appropriations Committee of this House. [Applause.] We should not allow that bunch of bureaucrats down there to determine how that money should be spent.

I want to read some damaging testimony which I read in the hearings. Mr. Morgan testified that the land had cost $50 an acre.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERGUSON. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Morgan testified before the committee that the land cost on an average of $50 an acre, and then a little further on in his testimony he made this statement: "The study that we made of 977 tenants near Norris Dam showed that two-thirds of them had a farm income of less than $60 a year."

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERGUSON. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. THOM. The $50 an acre included buildings, not land alone, if the gentleman will read the complete testimony.

Mr. FERGUSON. I understand that, but if the gentleman has had any experience selling farms or foreclosing farms in the West, he will find that the improvements do not amount to anything.

Mr. THOM. The gentleman ought to be fair and quote Mr. Morgan as he testified. He testified that price included land and buildings.

Mr. FERGUSON. I am glad to include them. That is perfectly all right, but when land is sold nothing is received for the improvements. They are either wasted or torn down and are not considered as vital.

Now, it is all right to give the T. V. A. blanket authority to construct dams on the Tennessee River, but may I make this statement: When we tried to secure aid in order to construct dams on the North Canadian River down in our country, which river destroyed millions of dollars' worth of property, and a project for which the State of Oklahoma had put up considerable money, that project was turned down because it was not included in the dream of some special people that have the ear of the Congress and the administration. Lastly, may I say that when we pin the idea of national defense and flood control onto this bill it is a misnomer. I am reminded of the phrase used by Gibbon, when, in speaking of the Roman Empire, he said:

It is neither holy, Roman, nor an empire.

On my statement that the bill reminds me of Gibbon's phrase, let us examine the purported purpose of this bill—to improve navigation. On page 304 of the hearings General Pillsbury, of the Army Engineers, testified that a complete navigation system could be constructed for one-fourth the cost of the proposed system, and not more than $75,000,000 could be justified from the benefits derived by navigation. So that eliminates three-fourths of the proposed cost.

The same General Pillsbury stated the seven or eight proposed high dams would solve the local flood-control problem by the unique method of flooding the entire Tennessee Valley; in his own words, "You understand that when this system of high dams is built there will be very little bottom land left in the Tennessee Valley, which is the natural valley to be flooded, and it will all be covered by the dam except the important cities such as Knoxville, Chattanooga, and the regions about them." And as far as the effect on floods on the lower Mississippi are concerned, he says, "The effect on the Mississippi would be measured in inches and fractions of an inch in a high flood."

So it is plain to see the bill has no flood-control value. That should be stricken from the title.

From what I could gather from the statement of Col. C. T. Harris, Assistant Secretary of War, on page 327, it has little to do with the successful prosecution of a war.

Now, to be brief, this bill has as its primary feature the construction of seven or eight large power plants—a great extension of power before the dams now completed or under construction have had a chance to prove their worth. Why should the Nation pay for the creation of more power than at present can possibly be used, allow T. V. A. to sell this power below cost, and give the Tennessee Valley a power that will allow it to attract industries to that valley at the expense of the rest of the country, with the taxpayer paying the bill?

I want to refer again to the response we in Oklahoma have had to our application for the construction of dams under the works program, and the State agreed to buy the land and operate the dam. Yet those dams have not been approved. In the Tennessee Valley the Government buys the land, constructs the dams, gives the State 5 percent of the gross proceeds, and after all that, under this present bill, T. V. A. is even authorized, after paying two prices for poor land, to assist the farmers in moving to a new area.

I do not want to appear as an obstructionist. But before we expand the already great powers of T. V. A. we should look to the flood-control, soil-erosion, and refinancing problems of the West, and not spend all the money on a section that in many parts is ruined beyond recovery.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 12 of said act, as follows:

"SEC. 12. (a) In order (1) to facilitate the disposition of the surplus power of the Corporation according to the policies set forth in this act; (2) to give effect to the priority herein accorded to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations in the purchase of such power by enabling them to acquire facilities for the distribution of such power; and (3) at the same time to preserve existing distribution facilities as going concerns and avoid duplication of such facilities, the Board is authorized to advise and cooperate with States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations situated within transmission distance from any dam where such power is generated by the Corporation in acquiring and operating (a) existing distribution facilities and incidental works, including generating plants; and (b) interconnecting transmission lines; or to acquire any interest in such facilities, incidental works, and lines."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: On page 6, line 18, after the word "or", strike out "to acquire" and insert in lieu thereof "in acquiring."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I apologize to the Committee for bringing in an amendment merely to correct a verbal situation. I presume the House understands by now that this bill was formulated under conditions that were not very conducive to accuracy.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding to section 14 of said act the following:

"For the purpose of accumulating data useful to the Congress in the formulation of legislative policy in matters relating to the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and the production of chemicals necessary to national defense and useful in agriculture, and to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies, and to the public, the Board shall keep complete accounts of its costs of generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and shall keep a complete account of the total cost of generating and transmission facilities constructed or otherwise acquired by the Corporation, and of producing such chemicals, and a description of the major components of such costs according to such uniform system of accounting for public utilities as the Federal Power Commission has, and if it have none, then it is hereby empowered and directed to prescribe such uniform system of accounting, together with records of such other physical data and operating statistics of the Authority as may be helpful in determining the actual cost and value of services, and the practices, methods, facilities, equipment, appliances, and standards and sizes, types, location, and geographical and economic integration of plants and systems best suited to promote the public interest, efficiency, and the wider and more economical use of electric energy. Such data shall be reported to the Congress by the Board from time to time with appropriate analyses and recommendations, and, so far as practicable, shall be made available to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies which may be concerned with the administration of legislation relating to the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy and chemicals useful to agriculture. After July 1, 1937, the Authority shall not sell the surplus power or chemicals produced by it annually below the cost of the aggregate production for each year."

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILCOX: Page 6, line 22, after the word "following", insert "the Board shall, on or before January 1, 1937, file with Congress a statement of its allocation of the value of all such properties turned over to said Board, and which have been completed on or before said date, and shall thereafter in its annual report to Congress file a statement of its allocation of the value of such properties as have been completed during the preceding 12 months."

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply requires the filing of information with the Congress by the Board of the Tennessee Valley Authority as to its allocation of the value of the properties devoted to flood control, navigation, national defense, and the production of power.

The original act, in section 14, requires the Board to make such an allocation. It is recognized in the act as essential in order that the Congress and the country generally may be acquainted with the allocation made by the Board in determining the depreciation to be charged off each year in the rate base for the sale of electric current.

When I spoke in the general debate on yesterday I emphasized the fact that the T. V. A. is not primarily a power project. Its principal authority for existence is as a national defense measure. Next in importance is its navigation and flood-control aspects and the production and distribution of power is only incidental. In the sale of such surplus power as is generated we must provide against subsidizing the institution by providing that power shall not be sold below the cost of production. One of the proper items of cost to be considered is depreciation, and this can only be determined by first ascertaining the value of the property devoted to the manufacture of electricity.

The original act, as I have said, requires this allocation to be made, but it does not specify any time within which it shall be made, and the act does not require any report on the actions of the Board to the Congress. Under the original act the Board could wait 20 years to make the allocation if it saw fit and thus delay Congress in finding out what depreciation should be charged.

This amendment simply requires that on or before January 1 of 1937 the Board shall file with the Congress its report of its allocation of the value of the properties devoted to these specific purposes and that thereafter, annually, it shall file a similar report of its allocation of the value of the properties that have been completed during the preceding 12 months.

I think the committee will recognize this as essential if we are to determine the correctness of the so-called "yardstick of rates" for power sold by the Authority. We can only determine the correctness of the yardstick if we know that the depreciation charge is correctly entered on the books of the Corporation, and this, of course, can be determined only in the event we know that a proper allocation has been made between the various divisions of the activities of the Corporation.

I think this amendment will probably be accepted without objection, because it simply requires information to be filed with the Congress and does not impose any further or additional duty upon the Board, and I call for a vote.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MAY. I understood the gentleman to say—and I hope I am correct—that the amendment provides that this report may be made not only on January 1, 1937, but each year thereafter.

Mr. WILCOX. The amendment requires that the Board shall on or before January 1, 1937, file with the Congress a statement of its allocation of value of all such properties turned over to the Board which have been completed on or before said date, and shall thereafter, in its annual report to Congress, file a statement of its allocation of the value of such properties as have been completed during the preceding 12 months.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DRIVER). The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: Page 8, line 4, strike out all after the period beginning with the word "after" to the end of the section and insert in lieu thereof the following: "It is hereby declared to be the policy of this act that in order, as soon as practicable, to make the project self-supporting and self-liquidating, the surplus power shall be sold at rates which, when applied to the normal capacity of the Authority's power facilities, will produce gross revenues in excess of the cost of production of said power."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think we will all agree that we do not want the project in the Tennessee Valley to be carried on by Government subsidy and that we want this project to be self-supporting and self-liquidating, and that we want to go further than do the private power companies and have the project amortize out the cost of the project.

Those of you who heard the very able speech of the gentleman from Florida on yesterday will recall how he outlined the testimony before the Military Committee to the effect that the Tennessee Valley Authority is today fixing its rate bases so as to charge up a certain amount for taxes, a certain amount for interest on the money, and a certain amount to amortize out the cost of the different dams, and the language of the amendment which I have offered would simply provide that it is the policy that the Tennessee Valley Authority, in fixing its rates, will fix the rates so that when they are applied to the normal capacity of the power facilities, the gross revenues derived from the sale of surplus power will be in excess of the cost of the production of the power.

This language carries out the purpose much more clearly and much better than the language in the bill which the amendment strikes out. The language in the bill which is stricken out by my amendment carries a provision as to an annual cost of production; in other words, your power rates must be based on each year's cost of production. There is not anybody in the world who can tell in advance just exactly what 1 year's cost of production might be. Furthermore, your first customer cannot pay all of your cost of production, and this project, like all other businesses, has to have a reasonable time to get started and to begin the process of self-liquidation.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield, briefly, for a question.

Mr. MAY. The only difference between the amendment offered by the gentleman and the provision in the bill embraced in lines 4 to 6, on page 8, is that the bill fixes the date as of July 1, 1937, after which they must perform according to the language of the section, whereas the gentleman's amendment does not fix any date at all.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Many of the dams, of course, will not be constructed by that time, and let me say to the gentleman, speaking about construction, we may take, for instance, the Norris Dam, about which we have heard so much. The Norris Dam will never be paid for from power generated and sold from that dam, because the Norris Dam is a great storage dam for purposes of flood control and for purposes of increasing the power at other dams down the stream.

For instance, the power companies in 1926 offered the Government $1,200,000 for the increased power that there would be at the Wilson Dam, due to the construction of the Norris Dam.

(The time of Mr. HILL of Alabama having expired, he was given 5 minutes more.)

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. The language you are seeking to strike out contains a definite statement about the price of power.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It is tied down to the cost of production in a given year.

Mr. SNELL. Under the language you are seeking to insert, as I heard it, you never would have to sell power at the cost of production.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think not; I think as the Tennessee Valley Authority is a Government agency set up by act of Congress, it will be controlled by Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Unless it reaches the point of the average facilities, and if it never reached that point you would not have to sell.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. If it never reached that point, under the language in the bill you could not do it. There is no way that you can absolutely guarantee the sale of the power.

Mr. SNELL. Under the language carried in the bill you could not sell it for less than the cost of production after 1937.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. You cannot tell what the annual cost is going to be.

Mr. SNELL. There is no reason why you cannot if you keep books. I guarantee that I could tell with the proper set of books.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It would be difficult to tell in the period when you are constructing the dams and getting the project started.

Mr. SNELL. But not after you get it started and completed.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. You have got to go out and sell the power under the basic act, and you are giving preference to counties, municipalities, and organizations under 20- and 30-year contracts. The first year's sale of power might be under the cost of production, and if it were then the power companies would tie you up by an injunction in court. And no city would invest its money in a distribution system and contract to purchase the power under such uncertainty.

Mr. SNELL. I know, but you would know what it cost; and, as I understand your policy, it is not to sell at less than the cost of production.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. Why not put it in the bill so that people will understand it?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. We have declared it in my amendment.

Mr. SNELL. The language is so obscure that nobody can understand it.

Mr. DORSEY. Is it not a fact that under the present language of this bill it will be utterly impossible, because of the wording "adequate production for the year", to state the rate?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. It will be utterly impossible to state a rate. You never would get a contract; and if you got a contract, you would be dragged into court by the power companies, with all kinds of injunctions, just as you are tied up in court today. You cannot operate under the language of the bill today, and so far as chemicals are concerned, you would absolutely destroy what was the intent of the Congress when it passed the basic act.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I read the bill as it stands on the subject as mandatory. Is the gentleman's amendment mandatory, or simply an admonition?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. My amendment is a straight declaration of policy as to how this Authority shall proceed. Let me say this as to the fertilizer proposition: The idea and intent of Congress as to fertilizers was that we should carry on experimentation, that we should carry on research. If you are going to say that you cannot make any fertilizer down there unless you show that you are absolutely producing that fertilizer and will sell it for at least equal to the cost of production, then you have to take some old, proven, well-known method, because that is the only way that you can be sure that you can sell it for the cost of production.

You have down there nitrate plant no. 2, which cost the Government some $60,000,000. We are using a part of that plant today in making fertilizer. Everybody knows that the Government paid far too much for the construction of that plant, and yet if you tie down this cost of production too tight, will you charge the fertilizer production right from the beginning with this $60,000,000? Certainly we are too sensible to do that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. McSWAIN. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN to the amendment proposed by Mr. HILL of Alabama: At the end of said proposed amendment, after the word "power", strike out the period and insert the following language: "and in addition to the statement of the cost of power at each power station, as required by section 9 (a) of the Tennessee Valley Act of 1933, the Board shall file with each annual report a statement of the total cost of all power generated by it at all power stations during each year, the average cost of such power per kilowatt hour, the rates at which they were sold, and to whom sold, and copies of all contracts for the sale of power."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen will recall that yesterday I called attention to the fact that in three places of the basic act of 1933 the language indicates clearly that it was the intention of the Congress that power and fertilizer and munitions should be sold at a price not below the cost, ultimately. The very language of the bill before us, which was prepared by the representatives of directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority, page 7, implies that very thought. Page 7, line 5, it speaks of "its costs of generation", and in line 7 of "the total cost of generating and transmitting", and in line 10 "of the major components of such costs", and in line 16, "helpful in determining the actual cost and value of services."

The thought that could not be escaped by anybody who was considering this whole proposition, as I indicated yesterday, is that surely cost must ultimately be the minimum figure at which any of these commodities may be sold.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If that statement is correct, and I think it is, what is the objection to putting it right into the bill so that any man who reads it can understand it?

Mr. McSWAIN. I think I can explain that. I think the gentleman is a good enough business man, because he has that reputation, to realize that during the period of inauguration no business can be self-sustaining. The Committee recognized that, and at the conference where the terms of the bill H. R. 8527 were agreed on, it was then understood among us that the date should be 1938—July 1. When the bill came back into the full committee it was amended, as the committee had a right to do, and the date was reduced 1 year to July 1, 1937. That shows that those of us who were strongly in favor of the cost provision, as I am, being the minimum yardstick ultimately, the question as to when exactly it could be applied was in our minds. My amendment is to the effect that they must incorporate in their annual report every year the total amount of cost for the total amount of power produced, the average cost per kilowatt-hour, the rates at which it is being sold, to whom it is being sold, and copies of the contracts for the sale of power.

Now, we realize, I think, that we are not now in a position to say what the cost is. We do not have the information. We are not in a position now to say that it shall go on a cost basis right now. I submit that we are not in a position now to say exactly at what definite date in the future we can go on a cost basis, but I do say that after we have gotten 1 or 2 or 3 annual reports with the information required by this amendment, we will know, and then Congress can apply its power and say, "Henceforth if you are not already on a cost basis, you must go on a cost basis."

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman knows that the bone of contention on this proposition in committee was the date as to when they would be charged with the responsibility of making some money on this thing. The gentleman knows furthermore we discussed the fact that they said they would be able to operate Norris Dam at the end of this year. The Hill amendment as offered is not cured by the gentleman's amendment to the extent that the Hill amendment leaves it absolutely indefinite as to when they will be required to make a profit, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina only asks for certain information, and the controversy is as to the date.

Mr. McSWAIN. That is true, but the point is that while the Hill amendment is indefinite as to time and leaves it in the discretion of the directors, I think when we get the definite information called for by this amendment, we will then be in a position to fix the date, which we are not now in a position to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] has expired.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have now come to the first important question in this bill. It was a matter of long and careful study by the members of the entire committee as to when the Tennessee Valley Authority ought to be required to begin to show a profit upon the investment of the hundreds of millions of dollars furnished T. V. A. We debated it pro and con, and after we had considered all of the testimony, after it had appeared that Dr. Morgan testified the Norris Dam would be completed by the first day of next January, and that his transmission line to Muscle Shoals would be completed in the next 6 months, and that when that was done the capacity of the Muscle Shoals Dam would be increased three times, then the committee took the position that if they were in position then to produce electricity in a field where they have no market, the first thing to do was to let them get a market or show us they were not making any money. Their answer to it was set out in their annual report, and here it is: They claimed time after time to our committee that they had already made money. They show on page 57 of their annual report a net profit of $824,557.76. They testified before our committee that they were not selling power at a loss, and if they made that much money last year, nearly a million dollars, and if they reduced electric rates as the gentleman from Florida [Mr. WILCOX] says, $7,000,000 in that community by other utilities, what in God's world is to keep them from operating without losing money 2 years from now?

The 1st day of July 1937 is 2 years from the first day of this month. I think it is out of the question for the House to think about allowing this concern, with its disposition to spend money recklessly, to operate these electric facilities more than 2 years without requiring them to come to this Congress and show us they are making money. The amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] will do that, but we ought to put a limit on them and require them to begin to get ready to pay a profit some time in the operation of this concern.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Is it not true that the Authority has sold power and allocated the funds to non-revenue-producing projects?

Mr. MAY. Certainly. In addition to that, they gave power to the War Department in the operation of their facilities in flood-control dams in the river, to the amount of $25,000 last year that is not included in their profits of $824,000. So that I see no reason for allowing them to run loose for another 2 years without showing Congress that they are on a paying basis.

The CHAIRMAN The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

From the statements made by the chairman of the committee and also by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] we are all agreed that the T. V. A. shall not continue to sell power down there at less than the cost of production. If that is so, and the man who is operating the Tennessee Valley Authority says that the entire unit will be completed by the 1st day of next January, and they are given a year and a half leeway, I cannot see any reason why we should not say in this bill in plain language what we mean, that after January 1, 1937, the T. V. A. shall not sell electrical energy at less than the cost of production.

I have read the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] quite carefully. If there is a single word in that which says they cannot forever sell electricity at less than the cost of production, I should like to have the gentleman show me what word that is. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I did not understand the gentleman's query.

Mr. SNELL. I cannot find anything in the gentleman's amendment that precludes selling electrical energy at less than cost.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No. It may be that in the beginning it may sell some of this energy below cost, just like any other business, when it begins to operate, sells sometimes below cost.

Mr. SNELL. Can the gentleman show us anything in his amendment that says, for instance, that in 1940 or any particular date it must operate at a profit?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. No; no year is specified in the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. That is just my point, and for that reason I am opposed to the amendment. It does not carry out the theory of the gentleman that after 2 years it must operate at a profit, and does not say definitely in language every person can understand that the T. V. A. must sell electrical energy at the price of production. It is very evident to me you do not mean what you say, and you are going to cut that part out of the bill.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to add some comment regarding the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama. It has been said, and rightfully so, that any large organization starting in a new field must of necessity have a considerable number of years in which to attain a position where it may reasonably be expected to operate with profit. I admit the T. V. A. should have a reasonable number of years in which to be able to attain a position where they could sell power or could be compelled to sell power at not less than cost. It is generally recognized that a private business is given a certain number of years in which to get itself on a regular operating basis, but there is always a fixed date when they have either got to produce results or quit. It seems to me it would be a very good thing to let the Tennessee Valley Authority know that there is a day coming when they have got to sell power at what it costs them. They have the sole authority to allocate the funds given to them to revenue-producing projects and otherwise. It is a fact today that of the $151,000,000 of the taxpayers' money which is being used by the T. V. A. only $25,000,000 is now allocated to revenue-producing projects.

When this bill was originally brought before the committee this section contained the date of July 1, 1938. Many members of the committee felt that was a very fair date and a concession to the T. V. A., but a majority of the committee felt that even this was going too far, and the date was advanced to July 1, 1937. I for one cannot understand why the Democratic members of that committee are not going to support the committee bill by defeating the amendment. The best thing we could do to the T. V. A. today is to let them know that there is a date coming, whether it is 1937, 1938, 1939, or 1940, when they have got to sell their power at a price at least equal to what it costs.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my good friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from New York, pointed out that three-quarters of the membership of the committee felt that 1938 was too late a date to set as the dead line after which the Tennessee Valley Authority would be compelled to sell all its power at or above the cost of production; and so the date was advanced to 1937, as has been described.

There is more to the story, however, than just that statement. I do not say that the gentleman was insincere in omitting the description of those additional factors that guided the committee, but here is the situation, Mr. Chairman:

In addition to the members of the committee, colleagues of mine, who felt that the date 1938 should be advanced to the date 1937, the three-quarters of the committee membership who voted to strike out 1938 and advance the date 1 year included also those who wanted to discredit the yardstick, who wanted to make it difficult for the Tennessee Valley Authority to operate in reference to the entire project and who wished to defeat the essential purposes of this bill.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KVALE. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman will admit to the Committee, of course, that there was testimony before our committee by Dr. Morgan, of the T. V. A., that they adopted their policy in September 1933, and fixed a schedule upon which they based their rates and on that they claimed to have made a profit last year. Is not that correct?

Mr. KVALE. Without taking up that argument, the gentleman also knows that the date of 1937 as now carried in the measure will make it impossible for the present project and the present plans to be carried to fruition to make a unified system operating economically, and will make it impossible for them to make contracts with their municipalities or to make favorable adjustments in the interest of the consumers of power generally, particularly rural customers.

Mr. McFARLANE. How many members of the committee wanted to wing this bill any way they could, as shown by the hearings of the committee?

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is friendly, but he is facetious.

Mr. McFARLANE. I should like to know.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, this is a vital amendment. The gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HILL, is sponsoring an amendment which seeks to restore some of the damage that has been wrought on the face of this measure by those who are sincere in their belief that the power and activities of the T. V. A. should be curtailed or modified. I choose to stand with the gentleman from Alabama and thank him for his courageous position and earnestly hope his amendment will prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 98, noes 67.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 15. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds not to exceed in the aggregate $50,000,000 outstanding at any one time, which bonds may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for carrying out the powers and purposes of basic act approved May 18, 1933, being Public Act No. 17 of the Seventy-third Congress. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall mature within such periods not more than 50 years from the date of their issue, may be redeemable at the option of the Corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated therein, shall bear such rates of interest not exceeding 3 percent per annum, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, shall be issued in such manner and amount and sold at such prices: Provided, That such bonds shall not be sold at such prices or on such terms as to afford an investment yield to the holders in excess of 3 percent per annum. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed, both as to interest and principal, by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments and may be accepted as security for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the Corporation should not pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds issued hereunder, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the Corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the Corporation acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the Corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation shall have power to purchase such bonds in the open market at any time and at any price."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk; and in connection with this first amendment I have another amendment which I ask unanimous consent to have read at this time for the information of the House, the latter amendment being on the same subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first amendment offered and then for the information of the House read the second amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 8, line 15, after the word "Congress", insert ": Provided, That the proceeds from the sale of such bonds by the Corporation are authorized to be appropriated for the purposes of such basic act and may be expended only in consequence of such appropriations."

Amendment proposed by Mr. BUCHANAN: On page 10, strike out lines 9 to 20, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 26. Commencing July 1, 1936, the proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, and from any other activities of the Corporation, including the disposition of any real or personal property, shall not be expended by the Board except in consequence of annual appropriation thereof by Congress, and the appropriation of such proceeds is authorized to meet the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds, and for operating capital, or for improvements, betterments, or the acquisition of facilities necessary to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the use by the Board after June 30, 1936, of proceeds accruing prior to July 1, 1936, for the payment of obligations lawfully incurred prior to such latter date."

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, this is the first of a series of amendments which I expect to offer, and will continue to offer, until we adopt a national policy that will apply to every corporation organized and conducted by the Government. [Applause.] We have in existence over 20 Government corporations with no strings on them, with little control over them, and with no right to investigate by regular committees, either the Appropriations Committee or any other committee, without a special resolution providing for this purpose. Special resolutions should not be necessary for the investigation of any corporation unless there is real ground to expect fraud or dishonesty in its administration. Therefore, I say that every cent of money this Congress hereafter grants to any of these corporations, whether it be realized from the sale of authorized bonds or not, should be placed in a special fund in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of that corporation and expended only upon appropriation by the Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Will the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, with which I heartily agree, require the proceeds of the profits of the business of the Tennessee Valley Authority to be likewise paid into the Treasury?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The second amendment read, and which I have not as yet offered because we have not reached page 10, provides for and covers that matter.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that he include as a part of his remarks a list of the corporations just referred to, because yesterday before the Ways and Means Committee it was specifically denied that the Government was in business, when I knew better.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is not pertinent to this inquiry. I have a list of 20 such corporations here, and there are a few more. If the gentleman wants to see this list, I will be glad to show it to him. I do not expect, however, to interject in my remarks this foreign substance for political purposes, because I am not dealing in politics at all. I am dealing with the Tennessee Valley Authority, and I want it conducted on business principles.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to giving that Corporation or any other Government corporation unlimited authority to spend money where they please. Why do I say that? I make that statement by reason of my experience in connection with the conduct of hearings on the Tennessee Valley Authority last May. [Applause.] We have to maintain control over every dollar not only spent by these corporations but by governmental departments. Why not give the Post Office Department the right to spend its revenues without appropriation? Why not give the Panama Canal the right to spend its receipts without appropriations? Why not give the Patent Office authority to spend its receipts without appropriations? The reason we do not give them such authority is because it is our business to require all of these agencies to come before the regular committees of Congress, give an accounting in reference to the expenditure of money in the past fiscal year, and lay down the program before the committee as to what they expect to do with the money to be appropriated for the coming fiscal year. Mr. Chairman, I ask the Members to adopt this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: On page 10, line 3, after the word "States" and after the period, insert a new sentence, as follows: "Bonds issued by the Corporation under this section shall be exempt both as to principal and interest from all taxes, except surtaxes, estate taxes, inheritance taxes, and gift taxes now or hereafter imposed by the United States or by any District, Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or legal taxing authority."

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. Is that germane to the bill? It relates to the taxing authority of the Government, and that can only be considered when coming from the Ways and Means Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment is germane in that it simply provides an exemption with respect to the bonds to be issued by the Corporation.

Mr. TABER. Will the Chair rule on the other part of the point of order, that a bill coming from this committee cannot be considered when it relates to the taxing power of the Government and that the amendment does relate to the taxing power of the Government, and therefore must come from the Ways and Means Committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the amendment strikes at that power in an incidental way, and therefore is not subject to the point of order.

The point of order is overruled.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, this provision was called to my attention by the Treasury Department through a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, the Honorable T. J. Coolidge, dated July 5, 1935, in which he voluntarily suggested to me its desirability and offered to furnish the language, which I asked him to do, and on the same date, by hand, he sent me a letter, in which he proposed the identical language offered. I do not care to read these letters, but I ask permission to extend my remarks at this point and insert the letters in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to follow:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, July 5, 1935.

Hon. JOHN J. McSWAIN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: My attention has been called to S. 2357, proposing amendments to the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, which passed the Senate on May 13 (calendar day, May 14), 1935, and which I understand is now pending before your committee. I desire to call the attention of your committee to one matter in connection with section 9 proposing to amend section 15 of the original act authorizing the issue of bonds.

The amendment would authorize the Corporation to issue bonds, fully guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and similar to those authorized to be issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation. However, with respect to fully guaranteed bonds heretofore authorized to be issued, it is provided that the bonds shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any district, Territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or local taxing authority. I find no such provision in the proposed amendment to section 15 as set forth in section 9 of S. 2357.

The exemptions accorded to bonds of the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and of the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation are similar to those accorded bonds of the United States issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, and to omit a similar provision from bonds authorized to be issued by the Corporation would, I believe, be unwise.

Sincerely yours,

T. J. COOLIDGE,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, July 5, 1935.

Hon. JOHN J. McSWAIN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. McSWAIN: I have your letter of this date relative to the amendment proposed to H. R. 8632 in my letter also of this date. Section 9 of H. R. 8632 amends section 15 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act. In section 15 of that act, as amended by section 9 of H. R. 8632, there is no tax exemption conferred upon the bonds authorized to be issued thereunder. In this form the amended section would repeal the tax exemption contained in section 15 of the original act, and the apparent result of the amendment would be to authorize the issue of bonds limited to yield not in excess of 3 percent per annum and carrying no exemption. Bonds now guaranteed by the United States Government, such as those issued by the Home Owners' Loan Corporation and the Federal Farm Mortgage Corporation, are accorded the privilege of exemption from all taxes except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes. In view of this fact, it would obviously be to the considerable disadvantage of the Tennessee Valley Authority to attempt to market taxable bonds.

I accordingly suggest that there be inserted on page 10, line 3, after the words "United States", the following sentence: "Bonds issued by the Corporation under this section shall be exempt, both as to principal and interest, from all taxation (except surtaxes, estate, inheritance, and gift taxes) now or hereafter imposed by the United States or any district, territory, dependency, or possession thereof, or by any State, county, municipality, or legal taxing authority."

Very truly yours,

T. J. COOLIDGE,
Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think the gentleman from South Carolina should make a brief explanation of the purpose of this amendment. I do not understand it myself and I do not believe many of the other Members understand it.

Mr. McSWAIN. The provisions of the amendment simply provide expressly what is implied by reference to the Second Liberty Loan bonds, but for the purposes of precision and definiteness, the Secretary of the Treasury thought we should exempt these bonds from taxation, municipal or otherwise, except as to inheritance taxes and surtaxes. It seemed to me this was a wise provision so as to render these bonds more salable and to leave the investors in these bonds in a position where there could be no question as to whether or not the bonds would be taxable.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Has the gentleman any information as to whether or not the House is going to proceed to report out a proposed constitutional amendment, with respect to tax-free securities, as requested by the President?

Mr. McSWAIN. No; I have no information whatsoever about that.

Mr. MICHENER. Does the President, in view of that message, advocate these bonds?

Mr. McSWAIN. Of course, I do not know. As I have said, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury called it to my attention as being desirable, and I have offered the amendment. I think it is in harmony with the spirit of the bill and the law that these bonds should be tax free.

Mr. MICHENER. But not in harmony with the message.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. In relation to the inquiry of my friend from Michigan, I may say that the President's message covers the whole field of Federal and State bonds, and this is an entirely collateral matter, and in no way related to the broad and proper inquiry of my friend from Michigan. This is a necessary amendment under existing conditions and one that ought to be adopted.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, since I have been in Congress there has been continual agitation to stop the issuance of tax-exempt securities. We hear man after man on the floor here advocating this theory and then every time some kind of new bond issue is authorized we have the same provision stuck onto it for the benefit of the great, big, financial genius who wants to get out of paying his taxes. This is good Democratic doctrine, is it not? To go on issuing securities of this kind at the same time your President tells you we ought to stop this sort of thing; and at the same time the Secretary of the Treasury tells the Ways and Means Committee that we ought to tax these tax-exempt securities, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury tells us we ought to go on and issue a lot more of them. Is this consistent? Are you folks sincere? Do you mean that we should abolish the issuance of tax-exempt securities? If you are sincere, if you believe in stopping up those holes where the great, big-income fellow can hide and avoid paying taxes, you will vote against this amendment; and let me say to you that if this amendment is adopted, I propose to ask for a roll call on the amendment.

I hope the committee will show its sincerity and its desire to protect the Treasury of the United States from further hiding of income taxes on the part of the extremely wealthy by voting down this amendment.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Did the gentleman vote on the proposed constitutional amendment that was considered in the Sixty-eighth Congress abolishing tax-exempt securities?

Mr. TABER. I cannot remember whether I did or not.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. The gentleman was a Member of that Congress, was he not?

Mr. TABER. I think so.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. I think it is dollars to doughnuts the gentleman voted against that proposed constitutional amendment.

Mr. TABER. I find, on checking the RECORD, that on February 8, 1924, I voted for the constitutional amendment permitting the taxing of tax-exempt securities. That makes no difference and it is no excuse for those in the Democratic Party who are running out on their President if they vote for this amendment.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is the gentleman going to vote for it?

Mr. TABER. I am not, and I am going to ask for a roll call against it if the amendment should be adopted in the committee.

Mr. McFARLANE. Is the gentleman in favor of it or against it?

Mr. TABER. I have spoken against it and I am against it. I do not double-cross anybody or demagogue, no matter what others may do. [Applause.]

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is absolutely no inconsistency in the motion made by the distinguished Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee and the recent message of the President of the United States, as stated by our distinguished friend from New York [Mr. TABER].

The message of the President of the United States was in relation to the whole question of tax-exempt securities, and that question involves not only the Federal Government but the State governments.

There are many matters of consideration on this subject—it is no easy question. So far as I am concerned, I feel that it is a matter that should be considered, and I was hopeful that it will be considered in its entirety by the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, let me say that this resolution was before the committee; that the committee set hearings to consider the matter; that people were invited to appear before the committee; and I understand—whether it is true or not I do not know—that at the request of the President the hearings were discontinued and nothing has been done; that was 3 or 4 months ago. Since then this other message has come in.

Mr. McCORMACK. I have heard Members on the floor purport to speak for the President of the United States, but from the statements made I knew without any further evidence that they did not speak for him. There are many remarks of that kind.

My friend from New York says that there is an inconsistency between the amendment offered by the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the recent message of the President of the United States. I say there is absolutely no inconsistency. The amendment offered by the chairman of the committee is absolutely consistent.

Why should we pick out this particular bond issue and say it shall not be tax exempt, when we have billions of dollars not only under this administration but under previous administrations that are tax exempt?

Personally I am in favor of taxing bond issues of governmental activities, Federal, State, and local. However, the question should be considered in its entirety. Why should we pick out this one issue of $50,000,000 and segregate it from all other outstanding bond issues, saying that those others shall be exempt and this issue shall not be exempt? This is not a friendly act to this bill.

So I say there is no inconsistency, and that the gentleman from New York himself is inconsistent. He is simply injecting partisan politics, which he has a right to do if he wants to; but do not let us be deceived as to the true meaning. The defeat of this amendment will injure this bill. There is no inconsistency. The amendment is absolutely consistent with the President's message. I do not fear a roll call on this amendment, and the amendment should be adopted. The whole question of tax exempts should be considered at one time and through a constitutional amendment. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BACON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. It is my understanding that the proposed constitutional amendment will not be retroactive and cannot be retroactive. It will apply only to bonds issued in the future. That being the case, every bond issue that you authorize from now on which carries the tax-exemption feature simply adds to the amount of bonds that tax evaders can take refuge in.

In answer to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. VINSON] I might say that I was a Member of the Sixty-eighth Congress and voted in favor of a constitutional amendment when it was offered, prohibiting the issue of tax-exempt bonds. I am not going to vote for any bond issue which carries the tax-exempt feature. I believe this amendment should be voted down so that we will not continue to build up a huge reservoir of tax-exempt bonds for tax evaders to take advantage of. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I agree with my distinguished colleague from New York [Mr. BACON] that it is time to call a halt on these tax-exempt securities. As a member of the Committee on the Judiciary, we were supposed to give mature consideration to a number of bills which were presented to our committee to do away with these tax-exempt securities. That was at the beginning of the session. We sincerely tackled the problem. A subcommittee was formed to take testimony on both sides of the issue. In the midst of our activities we were asked to halt temporarily. We yielded to that request. We stopped our hearings, and we all had it in mind, however, soon to reconvene to take up again the matter of tax-exempt securities. To be frank, we are waiting for orders, and I think the order should be forthcoming immediately. It is utterly ridiculous to allow such an avenue of escape to those who do not want to pay their taxes. The Ways and Means Committee—I say there is no partisan politics in the matter as far as I am concerned, because I am a Democrat—are considering measures for increasing inheritance taxes and income taxes, and while they are doing that on the one hand, we of the Judiciary Committee by our inaction under instructions, on the other hand, are making it easy to evade these very taxes which the Ways and Means Committee seeks to lay.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. McFARLANE. As one Member who has a bill before the gentleman's committee to submit a constitutional amendment to stop this tax-exemption racket, I am wondering when your committee is going to do something about holding hearings on my resolution.

Mr. CELLER. Our hands are tied. I want them untied. There has not been a single Secretary of the Treasury since I have been here, Republican or Democrat, who did not advocate doing away with tax-exempt securities. Mr. Mellon appeared before the Committee on Ways and Means and advocated it. Mr. Mills appeared and likewise advocated it. Mr. Woodin advocated it, and the present Secretary of the Treasury advocates it. And yet there is no action. Something is wrong. I lay the blame at the door of the President of the United States for failure to give us instructions we are seeking, and I say that advisedly. With all due deference to our honored President, I wish to say he made a strong declaration concerning tax exemptions, but pious declarations are meaningless unless followed by clear-cut definite action. Our committee is not likely to act unless and until the administration in a matter of such importance gives the word. I want that word given now.

Mr. KVALE. Granting that everything the gentleman says is justifiable and true, does not the gentleman still agree it may be a little risky now——

Mr. CELLER. I do not. There is no time like the present, and we ought to get to work immediately. [Applause.] It is ridiculous not to do it. The minute the President's tax message was read, what happened to tax-exempt securities? They rose in value, and very properly so, and they will continue to rise unless we block that rise. I say to the Committee, vote down this amendment. There should be no more tax-exempt securities.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. MEAD. I am in accord with the gentleman so far as acting on the constitutional amendment is concerned, but cannot the gentleman see that he will embarrass and handicap the Tennessee Valley Authority by starting now?

Mr. CELLER. I cannot see it. There will be no embarrassment. Every time we try to block tax exemptions the friends of the measure affected always say, "Do not pick on us." Thus T. V. A. friends say, "Leave our bonds alone. Pick on other projects."

Mrs. KAHN. Will the gentleman tell us who has tied the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary? Is it not an independent body and has it not sense enough to act itself?

Mr. CELLER. The gentlewoman from California can determine that for herself.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Referring to the question asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], does not the gentleman believe that if publicly owned and operated businesses can borrow money on a tax-exempt basis, whereas privately owned business has to borrow its money on a tax basis, that private business inevitably will be forced into socialism?

Mr. CELLER. There is no doubt about it. I agree with the gentleman. Examine the portfolios of the great banking institutions. They are bursting with tax-exempts. The amount of these bonds is constantly mounting. Let us call a halt.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have spoken on this matter several times before. I have here the RECORD of the debate in 1922, and I have the names of those who voted. You can hardly find one Democratic name as having voted in the affirmative on that matter, although recently when the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] stated he had offered an identical resolution many Democrats signified their intention of voting for it, and stated that they had always been in favor of it. I sent for the vote and showed those gentlemen that they voted against the identical resolution which is offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY]. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] voted for that resolution. Two hundred and forty-seven voted for it and 133 against it, and we lacked a two-thirds majority, all the Democrats, almost to a unit, voting against it.

We do not like to hear these professions constantly upon the floor of the House about their being in favor of a constitutional amendment on tax-exempt securities. I will wager that if it again comes before you the same argument will be presented—that the school districts and other corporate units in our less prosperous States would not be able to sell their securities, and could not finance themselves if they had to pay a higher rate of interest. All the Democratic leaders at that time opposed it. It was an identical resolution to the one now before the Committee on the Judiciary.

I have reminded this House before and I do it again, that I doubt if the people would ratify such a constitutional amendment, as much as I personally favor it. It would not have any force or effect in the State which has no State income tax. It is reciprocal. The State could tax the income on Federal securities and the Federal Government would tax the income on State securities. Unless all States have an income-tax law it would be of no avail. Many States do not want a State income-tax law. At the time it was before us, I voted for it, and the Republicans with only three or four exceptions voted for it, although the Republicans in States like Illinois said, "This is evidently a determined effort to make Illinois and all other States pass an income-tax law and do away with our present property tax rate on intangibles." There was that feature to be considered in those days, although it was under cover. It would still be persuasive. But when the Democrats of this House talk about their willingness to embrace this constitutional amendment, I need look back and read that record. Is it possible for the leaders of that party to have turned such an extreme somersault in the past few years? Do not those old arguments still hold? You make professions now in favor and argue that it is a way for wealthy people to invest their money and evade taxation. That was the argument then with just as much force as now. The situation has not changed.

I rose here for just a few moments in order to remind you that you are on record against it almost unanimously, as a political party. It was the Republicans who advanced it and we have continuously endorsed it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. McFARLANE. For the last 12 years prior to this administration the Republican Party has been in power and you had an opportunity to pass such a tax-exempt resolution if you wanted to.

Mr. GIFFORD. We voted 247 on this side to 133 on yours. We did have a big majority, but we could not get more than three or four of you, and we needed a few of you for a two-thirds majority and you were practically unanimous against it. [Applause.]

Mr. McFARLANE. You have never had a Republican President who has advocated it, have you?

Mr. MICHENER. But you have one now who will not let us consider it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] has expired.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I desire to ask our beloved friend, the Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, a question. Is there any other way we can obtain this money without issuing tax-exempt bonds?

Mr. McSWAIN. By appropriating it out of the Treasury. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] provides that the proceeds from the sale of these bonds shall be deposited in the Treasury. It cannot get out except by appropriation, and it seems to me it is a matter of tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I would rather have it go out tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum than have the laboring man go down in his jeans and pay for this project. It seems to me that if we could get the money from inheritance taxes and big-income taxes we will be able to pay for this project. This is not a meritorious amendment; therefore, it should be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN] has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be defeated. I have been here for 13 years, and for 13 years I have been hearing "Let us tax tax-exempt securities", and nothing has been done about it. Throughout those past years every time the Ways and Means Committee came in with a tax bill, I have risen on this floor and asked the chairman when we were going to be given an opportunity to vote to tax tax-exempt securities. Always in the future. Never today. I am in favor of this T. V. A. bill today. I think it is a good bill. I am against this amendment exempting these bonds from taxation. I think if we are ever going to start taxing tax-exempt bonds we might just as well do it now and tax them all as they come along, in this bill and every other bill which calls for the issuance of bonds.

My good friend and colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] said it might hurt the bill to tax these bonds. I say, let us start right now. It will not hurt this bill, and as fast as any other issues are put out, let us tax those, and then the Ways and Means Committee will soon bring in a bill taxing such tax-exempts as are taxable under a bill and the Judiciary Committee will bring in a constitutional amendment to get at the others.

I hope the amendment now before the House will be defeated.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Does not the gentleman realize that this is part of the "must" program?

Mr. CONNERY. All right. The President asked us to tax tax-exempt securities, so we will get off to a good start on his tax program today by defeating this amendment, which would exempt these bonds from taxation.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I tried to make the point a moment ago that while we may be in perfect sympathy with the general purposes of such a broad program, there is some risk now to the salability of these bonds; there is risk of the impairment of the credit of the Authority by taking this thing up piecemeal and taking a little slice off of a big problem now.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I may say to my dear friend from Minnesota that that has been the argument for the last 13 years. The bonds will sell all right. Let us make a beginning right now by defeating this amendment and then follow through in the future and put into action all the talk we have been hearing for many years about taxing tax-exempt securities. Now is the time. Let us do it today.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. EKWALL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EKWALL. Would it be in order to return to section 2 for the purpose of offering an amendment to change the name of the Aurora Dam to the John E. Rankin Dam? [Laughter.]

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to change its name to the Bob Rich Dam.

The CHAIRMAN. This Committee can do anything by unanimous consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the distinguished gentleman from Oregon, I will state that under an amendment adopted earlier this afternoon there is no longer any Aurora Dam.

Mr. EKWALL. Well, the Aurora is back here; I mean the roar is back here.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, a point of order; that is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That section 26 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 26. The net proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, and from any other activities of the Corporation, including the disposition of any real or personal property, after deducting the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds, and an amount deemed by the Board as necessary to withhold as operating capital, or to be devoted by the Board to improvements, betterments, or the acquisition of facilities necessary to carry out the purposes of this act, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: On page 10, strike out lines 9 to 20, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 26. Commencing July 1, 1936, the proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, and from any other activities of the Corporation, including the disposition of any real or personal property, shall not be expended by the Board except in consequence of annual appropriation thereof by Congress, and the appropriation of such proceeds is authorized to meet the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds, and for operating capital, or for improvements, betterments, or the acquisition of facilities necessary to carry out the purposes of this act: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to prevent the use by the Board after June 30, 1936, of proceeds accruing prior to July 1, 1936, for the payment of obligations lawfully incurred prior to such latter date."

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to bring the whole scheme into harmony with the principles that would be put into operation by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. Its purpose also is to harmonize the bill with section 13, beginning at the bottom of page 11; to wit, if all the money, as provided by the Buchanan amendment, is to go into the Treasury, and if all moneys for this Authority are to be taken from the Treasury, as they are in the case of the other administrative departments, then the present provision in section 10 is out of line, should be stricken out, and the language proposed in the amendment substituted. The members of the committee will note by reference to the report, which was prepared by myself, that I called attention to the fact that if section 13 should be adopted, the provisions of section 10 could not in any event be operative after January 1, 1936.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The chairman will bear out my statement to the effect that this amendment is not unfriendly to the general purposes of the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Certainly. I think I am one of the best friends T. V. A. has ever had.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. MAY. It is not the purpose of this amendment to change section 13 as now contained in the bill?

Mr. McSWAIN. No, no; this is to bring section 10 into harmony with what I hope will be done under section 13.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield.

Mr. FADDIS. I rise to express the appreciation of a great many Members of this committee to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. He is accomplishing exactly what a great many members of this committee have been fighting for all the time; namely, to put some business methods into the conduct of the T. V. A.; yet we have been accused of trying to hamstring the whole thing by so doing. We are the ones who are trying to save this Board from the consequences of their own folly. I congratulate the gentleman from Texas and the chairman of the committee upon the policy they are giving us. Their action may yet save this activity from becoming a discredit to all of us. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding at the end of said act a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 31. This act shall be liberally construed to carry out the purposes of Congress to provide for the disposition of and make needful rules and regulations respecting Government properties entrusted to the Authority, provide for the national defense, improve navigation, control destructive floods, and promote interstate commerce and the general welfare, but no real estate shall be acquired or held except what is actually necessary to carry out plans and projects actually decided upon requiring the use of such land: Provided, That any land purchased by the Authority and not necessary to carry out plans and projects actually decided upon shall be sold by the Authority as agent of the United States, after due advertisement, at public auction to the highest bidder.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LORD: Page 11, line 12, after the word "bidder", insert a new sentence, as follows: "Provided, That all properties of said Corporation shall pay taxes on real and personal property in the same manner as the real and personal property of other corporations and individuals."

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the reason that the curse of our land today is tax-exempt securities and tax-exempt properties. It leaves too much of a tax on the people who have to pay. Now we are setting up a business in competition with other businesses of our land, and there is no reason why it should not pay the same rate of taxation as other businesses do, and I hope this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. ENGEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. ENGEL. For the purpose of the RECORD, permit me to state that I received a telegram from Michigan State authorities last week in the course of my study of this question stating that the Electric Light & Gas Co. paid into the treasury of the State of Michigan and other municipal subdivisions of the State $10,670,000 last year, not including income or Federal taxes.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think his amendment is consistent with the provisions of the original bill requiring that the States affected should receive 5 percent of the gross revenue from this operation?

Mr. LORD. In reply I may state that I think we should not have any tax-exempt securities or properties. If Government enterprises are to compete with private business they should be placed upon the same terms.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. And the States, therefore, should not receive a part of the gross income from this operation?

Mr. LORD. No State should receive any particular advantage over another State at the expense of all the taxpayers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LORD. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. May I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TAYLOR] if it is a fact that the States wherein this project is being installed will receive tax money paid into their treasury to the extent of 5 percent or more of the gross receipts?

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. That was my information when the bill was passed last year; however, I would refer the gentleman to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who can answer the question. As the bill passed last year did it not provide that the State of Alabama and one other State should receive 5 percent of the gross receipts derived from the operation of this plant?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. From the power facilities.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That money is paid to those States?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. That is in the basic act of 1932.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Of course, I am against that proposition.

Mr. DONDERO. Why not let the States have credit for 5 percent against any tax to be levied on their property, and even it up in that way?

Mr. LORD. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion may I say I do not think any particular State or States should receive a rebate or benefit to be paid at the expense of the taxpayers of all the other States and people of the Nation.

There has grown up in this country a custom of issuing tax-exempt securities and eliminating real property from taxation.

The Government is going in the field of industry competing with other industry, and if allowed to do business without paying taxes it will put private industry at a great disadvantage and deprive local tax units of the income to maintain local government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope it will not take but a few minutes to vote down this amendment.

Mr. LORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McSWAIN. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LORD. I did not introduce the amendment for the purpose of having it voted down. I hope the amendment prevails.

Mr. McSWAIN. I understand, and I know the gentleman introduced the amendment in all sincerity. I take the time to discuss it only because it strikes at one of the fundamental principles in our dual system of government. Every lawyer here remembers that, perhaps, the greatest decision rendered by Chief Justice John Marshall was to the effect that the power to tax involves the power to destroy. It was held in the particular case that the State of Maryland could not tax the United States Bank, because if it could tax the bank 5 cents it could tax it out of existence. Therefore I submit this amendment is violative of a fundamental principle of our dual system of government. We must never allow the Federal Government to reach into a State and tax a thing which belongs to the State, nor should we ever permit the State government to tax a single thing that belongs to the Federal Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Does the gentleman think that the State of Alabama and one other State should receive 5 percent of the gross receipts derived from the operation of this plant?

Mr. McSWAIN. That is water already over the dam.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. No; it is water still on the dam.

Mr. McSWAIN. No; that is in the law; and there is no proposal here to change it. Personally, as I viewed the matter then, I felt that the States of Alabama and Tennessee were already getting enough benefit and should not have another 5 percent. I will tell you what sort of a fellow I am. I know when I am run over. They are getting 5 percent.

Mr. Chairman, the Authority is setting aside 7½ percent in lieu of taxes for the purposes of accounting; therefore I submit that we ought to vote the amendment down and get to some really controversial issues in this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CHRISTIANSON) there were—ayes 38, noes 142.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 9 (b) of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows, and as so amended such amendment shall be effective on and after the 1st day of January 1936 occurring next after the approval hereof, by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"(b) All moneys of the Corporation of whatsoever nature hereafter received by or for the Corporation shall be immediately and without diminution deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States, and such portion thereof as is authorized by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, or other law, to be used by said Corporation in carrying out the provisions of said act, as amended, shall be transferred to an appropriate appropriation account, withdrawable only on warrant as are other appropriated public moneys, and subject to authority specifically granted by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, and as amended, all laws regulating the obligating or expenditure of other public moneys shall be applicable thereto: Provided, That until July 1, 1936, the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, shall not be applicable to purchases of supplies and equipment necessary for dam construction. Accounts of all transactions involving receipts or disbursements of the Corporation shall be duly rendered to the General Accounting Office at such times and in such substance and form as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States, and said accounts and such claims as may arise shall be settled and adjusted by the General Accounting Office under and pursuant to the provisions of title III of the Budget and Accounting Act, approved June 10, 1921: Provided, That the expenses of such portion of the audit as the Comptroller General may authorize to be done in the field shall be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. In such connection the Comptroller General and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property, and places belonging to, under the control of, or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with the balances in depositaries. The officers of the Corporation to whom moneys may be advanced on accountable warrant shall each give a bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law in such amount as shall be directed by the Comptroller General. Should there be any administrative delinquency in the rendering of the accounts as directed, or any unsatisfactory condition of the accounts, requisitions for funds shall be disapproved by the Comptroller General unless, for good cause shown, he shall elect to withhold such disapproval."

Mr. MILLARD (interrupting the reading of the bill). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the section may be dispensed with and printed in full in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the section.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: On page 13, beginning with the word "should", line 21, strike out the same, together with all other language in lines 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that it was stated to me that this language might be unconstitutional, as an infringement upon Executive authority. I am scrupulous about preserving the Constitution, scrupulous about preserving all Executive power, and to the same degree scrupulous about preserving all constitutional legislative power. The departments of the Government ought to remain absolutely separate and distinct in fact as well as in theory. [Applause.] I submitted the question to the Attorney General, and one of his agents stated to me that it was at least of doubtful constitutionality; and inasmuch as I do not want to take any position in reference to a matter of doubtful constitutionality, I am offering the amendment to strike the language.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, may I say to the Members of the House that I am glad to see there is someone on the Democratic side of the House of Representatives who is trying to have constitutional laws passed, instead of unconstitutional laws.

The whole Tennessee Valley Authority is unconstitutional, and the Government should go out of business in competition with its private citizens. This administration has passed more unconstitutional laws than any administration in the history of this country. I ask you the question: Are the Democratic Party and President Roosevelt trying to wreck our Constitution and our Nation? America, wake up!

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That section 9 (b) of the act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'(b) All purchases and contracts for supplies or services, except for personal services, made by the Corporation shall be made after advertising in such manner and at such times sufficiently in advance of opening bids as the Board shall determine to be adequate to insure notice and opportunity for competition: Provided, That advertisement shall not be required when, in the judgment of the Board, (1) the public exigency requires immediate delivery of the supplies or performance of the services; or (2) repair parts, accessories, supplemental equipment, or services are required for supplies or services previously furnished or contracted for; or (3) the aggregate amount involved in any purchase of supplies or procurement of services does not exceed $500; in which cases such purchases of supplies or procurement of services may be made in the open market in the manner common among business men: Provided further, That in comparing bids and in making awards the Board may consider such factors as the bidder's financial responsibility, skill, experience, record of integrity in dealing, ability to furnish repairs and maintenance services, the time of delivery or performance offered, and whether the bidder has complied with the specifications.

"'The Comptroller General of the United States shall audit the transactions of the Corporation at such times as he shall determine, but not less frequently than once each governmental fiscal year, with personnel of his selection. In such connection he and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property, and places belonging to or under the control of or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with and balances in depositaries. He shall make report of each such audit in quadruplicate, 1 copy for the President of the United States, 1 for the chairman of the board, 1 for public inspection at the principal office of the Corporation, and the other to be retained by him for the uses of the Congress: Provided, That such report shall not be made until the Corporation shall have had reasonable opportunity to examine the exceptions and criticisms of the Comptroller General or the General Accounting Office, to point out errors therein, explain or answer the same, and to file a statement which shall be submitted by the Comptroller General with his report. The expenses for each such audit may be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. All such audit expenses shall be charged to operating expenses of the Corporation. The Comptroller General shall make special report to the President of the United States and to the Congress of any transaction or condition found by him to be in conflict with the power of duties intrusted to the Corporation by law.'"

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would modify and change the language now in the bill with reference to the supervision and control of the Comptroller General.

The language in the bill, as the bill was reported to the House, gave the Comptroller General more power over the Tennessee Valley Authority than the Comptroller General has over any department or any division of the Government. The language in the bill as that bill came to the House gave the Comptroller General a veto power such as the President of the United States himself does not even dream of possessing.

It is true that the amendment offered by the distinguished chairman of the committee and adopted by the committee has changed and modified somewhat the language of the bill, but even as the language now stands, if the bill passes with the language, it means that the Tennessee Valley Authority cannot even purchase a lead pencil without first coming to Washington and getting the permission of some auditor or some accountant in the Comptroller General's office.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Not at this time.

We who are friends of the Tennessee Valley Authority—and let me say here that my good friend, the chairman of this committee, may oppose this amendment of mine, but he feels that having reported this bill he must stand by the bill and that he must go down the line for it—the amendment which I have proposed provides that the Comptroller General shall audit every transaction of the Tennessee Valley Authority at least once a year, and that the Comptroller General shall have free access to every book, to all the accounts, to all the files, to all the papers, and to everything in the possession of the Tennessee Valley Authority; and that, after he has made his audit, he shall send a report of the audit to the Congress of the United States.

In other words, my amendment provides that we shall have the Comptroller General make the most thorough and searching audit possible of the fiscal affairs of the Tennessee Valley Authority at least once a year. In doing this we are proceeding just as ordinary private business does. It carries on its business and then from time to time it has an audit made. The only difference is that we will have a much more thorough, complete, and searching audit from the Comptroller General than ordinary business has of its affairs.

The first thing that the Tennessee Valley Authority did, before it employed anyone, before it made a single contract, before it did a single, solitary thing, was to go to the Comptroller General's Office and say, "Mr. Comptroller General, we want to set our books up in proper fashion. We want you to name some man whom we can employ, who will set up a proper budget system for us and will enable us to have all our transactions so that every man can read and understand them", and the Tennessee Valley Authority proceeded to employ a man recommended by the Comptroller General, who had formerly been in the employ of the Comptroller General, and today, down at the head offices of the Tennessee Valley Authority, we find 10 representatives of the Comptroller General, 10 men from the General Accounting Office, auditing and going over the transactions and the accounts of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MAY. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KVALE. Then I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 2 additional minutes.

Mr. MAY. I withdraw my objection, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the Budget Bureau will tell you that there is not a more modern or a more nearly perfect system of bookkeeping anywhere than that of the Tennessee Valley Authority. Everything that is new or up-to-date in a bookkeeping system is to be found in the Tennessee Valley Authority's system, and every dollar of their money is down here in the Treasury of the United States. If you would read all these newspaper accounts and reports, you would think somebody had been here with a black bag and had run off with the money. I have here and hold in my hand the daily statement of the United States Treasury under date of July 5, 1935, and along with a statement as to the Departments of Agriculture and Relief and Public Works and other governmental agencies, we find a statement as to the money of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

What we do not want and what we feel would be absolutely fatal to this great project is for the Tennessee Valley Authority to have to come to Washington to get permission every time they are going to purchase anything or do anything. To illustrate, a short time ago they wanted to buy some hammer mills, and one of the bidders raised a protest and came to Washington, and it was 67 days before the Comptroller General approved what the Tennessee Valley Authority had done and permitted the purchase of these hammer mills. They wanted to buy some crushers, and the Comptroller General's office delayed them nearly 4 months, or 111 days. They wished to purchase cable ways, and there was a delay of 129 days. In each instance the action of the Tennessee Valley Authority was approved, but there was all this costly and unnecessary delay.

We cannot force this Authority, if it is to succeed, to come to Washington to get permission every time it has to buy a shovel or a strip of wood or something to carry on its business, and we ought not to do it. We have not done this with other Government agencies and other Government enterprises of a like nature.

We have the Inland Waterways Corporation and we ask that the Tennessee Valley Authority be treated in the same way as the Inland Waterways Corporation.

There is the Panama Canal Railroad, the Alaskan Railroad, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and a number of governmental agencies that do not have to go to the Comptroller General every time they want to buy a lead pencil. All we ask is that the Tennessee Valley Authority be treated as they are. If you want to hamstring, if you want to defeat this project, the way to do it is to put it in the meshes of red tape down at the General Accounting Office.

When President Roosevelt sent his message to Congress asking Congress to pass the basic T. V. A. Act, he said, "We want to set up a governmental agency and we want to give to that agency the flexibility and initiative of a private enterprise."

When the conference report on the basic act came to this floor the conference report, written by my good friend, the distinguished chairman of the committee, whom we all love, said, "We have sought to set up a legislative framework but not to increase it in a legislative strait-jacket. We intend that the Corporation shall have much of the essential freedom and elasticity of a private business corporation." Let us hold fast to this intent and thereby make possible the success of the great project. [Applause.]

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, this amendment has two parts. It has a very serious aspect. The first part confers power to make purchases of supplies without regard to existing law. The second provision is substantially a reenactment of existing law as to the audit by the Comptroller General.

Inasmuch as the present law takes care of the second paragraph, there can be no harm in defeating it. Your attention is directed to the seriousness of the first paragraph.

I really cannot bring myself to believe that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], for whom I have come to have a great deal of respect, prepared this amendment. It does not sound like his wisdom or thoughtfulness.

Ever since human frailty came in contact with public funds, there has been developing a system which is calculated to protect public funds from peculation by public officials. Such a law will be found in every school district, town, county, and State, and in the Federal statutes. It provides that when materials are required for public use they shall be purchased after advertisement for bids, and purchased from the lowest bidder. The effort has been to devise methods by which public officials can be held responsible and temptation kept as far as possible from them. To be sure, these laws have been violated, and it has been through certain well-known devices, all of which are enumerated here under the proviso.

The first paragraph provides:

> All purchases and contracts for supplies or services, except for personal services, made by the Corporation shall be made after advertising in such manner and at such times sufficiently in advance of opening bids as the Board shall determine to be adequate to insure notice and opportunity for competition: Provided, That advertisement shall not be required when, in the judgment of the Board, (1) the public exigency requires immediate delivery of the supplies or performance of the services; or (2) repair parts, accessories, supplemental equipment, or services are required for supplies or services previously furnished or contracted for; or (3) the aggregate amount involved in any purchase of supplies or procurement of services does not exceed $500; in which cases such purchases of supplies or procurement of services may be made in the open market in the manner common among businessmen: Provided further, That in comparing bids and in making awards the Board may consider such factors as the bidder's financial responsibility, skill, experience, record of integrity in dealing, ability to furnish repairs and maintenance services, the time of delivery or performance offered, and whether the bidder has complied with the specifications.

It will be seen that the opening sentence of the paragraph provides a wholly praiseworthy method of making purchases, and that immediately the proviso proceeds to kill its effectiveness entirely.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. In other words, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama starts out to put it under public advertisement and then by the proviso all that power is taken away.

Mr. McLEAN. It makes it absolutely worthless.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. A good part of that language comes from Thirty-fourth Statutes, page 258, in reference to purchases and procurement of supplies for the War Department.

Mr. McLEAN. As I said, this statute removes all restraints and furnishes all of the loopholes that have been responsible for all of the rascality that has developed through dishonest public officials, and which over a period of time legislative bodies have been trying to build up a system of law to avoid.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEAN. Yes.

Mr. SHORT. And does not the gentleman think that the excess of flexibility contained in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, if granted, is conducive to reckless expenditure and extravagance?

Mr. McLEAN. That is the point I am trying to make. That has been the experience of public officials, and of municipalities. Experience proves there must be some restraint and the universal practice is that when purchases are made by public officials for public work they must be made by advertisement and from the lowest responsible bidder.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. HARTER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This might be termed a weasel amendment. Is there any good reason why this Corporation, this agency of the Government, should not be subject to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, or should not be amenable to the control of the Comptroller General of the United States? Why should T. V. A., one of the 20 or more Government corporations that have been cited to us this afternoon by the illustrious Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, not be subject to this control which has been exercised over Government agencies and departments for so many years? No scandal has ever attached to Government departments and agencies so guided.

A lot of discussion has crept in the last 2 or 3 days which is susceptible of fooling a great many of us who have not made a very careful study of this proposed legislation. You will find upon examining the statutes of the United States that under the procedure established by those laws approval by the Comptroller General is not required of the ordinary expenditures in the Government departments and establishments.

The assertion so frequently made that you cannot buy a pencil or that T. V. A. could not make a 10- or a 50-dollar purchase without first taking it up with the Comptroller General at Washington is not true.

The General Accounting Office performs a magnificent service to the taxpayers of the United States. It is the watchdog of the Treasury.

The hundreds of thousands of ordinary routine expenditures are made in advance of audit on the responsibility of the bonded disbursing officers in various Government departments and agencies, and do not come before the General Accounting Office or the Comptroller General of the United States for scrutiny until after the end of the accounting period prescribed by the statutes, that is, the accounts are rendered either monthly or quarterly. (See, among other statutes, those set forth at 31 U. S. C. 78, 492, 496, 497.) When the accounts thus are rendered and examined the General Accounting Office may allow credit, it may suspend credit in order to obtain further explanation or evidence necessary to settlement (31 U. S. C. 74), or it may disallow credit. At any rate, the balances finally certified are by law made conclusive on the executive branch of the Government and the duties of the Comptroller General in passing upon such accounts and certifying the balances due thereon are required to be performed without direction from any other officer (31 U. S. C. 44, 71, 72). This procedure is equally applicable whether the accountable officer is stationed at Washington or at some remote point.

Let me call your attention to the provisions of section 3907 of the statutes. Remember, this amendment by the gentleman from Alabama does away with the necessity of this corporation complying with that section of the statute:

> Except as otherwise provided by law all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the departments of the Government and purchases of Indian supplies, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles or performance of the service. When immediate delivery or performance is required by the public exigency the articles or service required may be procured by open purchase or contract, at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold, or such services engaged between individuals.

Is there any reason why this agency of the Government should not comply with that statute? I wish the membership of the committee would take the bill before them and read section 13, which is now under consideration, and compare it with the language of the amendment which has been offered. I think you will find that there is no unreasonable requirement in the section of the bill as drafted by the House committee. Under the amendment as proposed the Comptroller General would have no control whatsoever over the expenditures of this corporation or any recourse against its directors or disbursing officers. It is true that he would be required to make an audit, but that audit would be made after the expenditures had been passed and after the bills had been paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McREYNOLDS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment. If I may have the attention of the Members of the House for just a few moments, I think I can show them why it is absolutely necessary, in order for us to do business with the T. V. A. in the South, to adopt the Hill amendment. There is quite an impression in this House that the T. V. A. is not under the Comptroller General.

That is not correct. Their accounts are checked. Twelve or fourteen people from the Comptroller General's office are there right now, with three rooms assigned to them. The present law provides that if they transgress their authority the Comptroller shall at once report that to the Congress and to the President of the United States. The Comptroller, in his evidence, said he had found no such irregularities.

May I call to your attention the fact that they could not purchase a piece of land, they could not build a dam if they had to come to the Comptroller to get recognition and the right to spend money, which this bill provides if this amendment is not passed. The issue is this: Are you going to turn the fiscal agency of the Tennessee Valley Authority over to those people who have been authorized to operate it or are you going to turn it over to the Comptroller General?

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McREYNOLDS. I am sorry. I do not have time.

That is the question. Is the Comptroller familiar with engineering? Is he familiar with the prices of the land which must be purchased in building these dams? Can he be? Certainly he is not. If you want to practically destroy this corporation, then reject the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL]. I appeal to every member of this committee to give this corporation the right to run that business under the strict checking of the Comptroller, which is being done now.

The gentleman from Alabama called your attention to the fact that Cove Creek Dam is built between two hills. The cable goes from one place across to another, and it was necessary to have a certain cable across that valley to carry the cement. The engineers advertised for lowest bids, but they concluded that this character of cable was absolutely necessary and they awarded the bid to a certain individual. The other man claimed that his cable would do the work and he carried his appeal to the Comptroller. It was 129 days before they heard anything from the Comptroller, but he then agreed with the Tennessee Valley Authority. However, if the Tennessee Valley Authority had to wait, which they would be compelled to do under this bill, they would then have been in rainy weather, and they would not have been able to make progress, and it would have cost this country hundreds of thousands of dollars.

I appeal to your reason. I do not object to every check that can be put on this Authority, and we want it, but we do object to McCarl or any of his deputies telling the Tennessee Valley Authority what character of material they can buy and be compelled to come to Washington and have them run this business. Am I not right? Answer me in this vote. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McREYNOLDS] has expired.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield to me to make a request?

Mr. SHORT. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, we have had 25 minutes of debate on this amendment. There is at least one other controversial amendment, perhaps more controversial than this one. We will, no doubt, have a motion to recommit. I think we ought to limit the debate if we are going to finish this bill today. We have had 25 minutes already—15 minutes in favor and 10 minutes opposed to the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be concluded in 15 minutes—5 more in favor of the amendment and 10 more opposed to the amendment—and I will conclude the debate with the last 5 minutes.

Mr. KVALE. Reserving the right to object, that precludes me from making a statement which I very much desire to make.

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not want to preclude the gentleman.

I will amend the request and ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto conclude in 25 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to trespass upon the time of the Committee at this late hour, but it is difficult for me to see how any member of this Committee could really vote for this amendment if he fully understood the import of it.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS], who has just spoken, said that the Comptroller General knew little or nothing about building dams, which is perhaps true. It might be equally well said that he knows little or nothing about engineering, so far as the various projects carried on by the Army and Navy are concerned. He knows very little about the construction of public buildings or public works. That is no justification why this particular board of authority should not be under the same jurisdiction and supervision as all other governmental agencies. If this amendment is adopted, I submit to the members of the Committee that it will grant such latitude, it will grant such elasticity to the Tennessee Valley Authority that it will be conducive to reckless spending, to enormous waste, and to gross extravagance. No one who listened to the hearings for the past 5 months in our committee or who has read them; no one who has read the report of the Comptroller General or heard his statement before our committee can doubt that, in my opinion, for one instant. It may be true, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCREYNOLDS], and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], have said, that the Tennessee Valley Authority has been held up temporarily because of delay on the part of the Comptroller General in making decisions, but the Comptroller General stated before the Military Affairs Committee of this House that if he were given an enlarged office force he would be able to give more immediate rulings on anything that might be submitted to his department.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHORT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman be kind enough to explain to us just what an auditing department does and just what its duties are?

Mr. SHORT. Well, I think perhaps it would require more than the 1 or 2 minutes remaining to me to explain that. I think the gentleman from southern Illinois realizes what an auditing department is.

Mr. KELLER. Oh, I do, thoroughly.

Mr. SHORT. Certainly the gentleman from Illinois would not object to this agency being placed under the same auditing supervision of the Comptroller as all other governmental agencies are.

I hope this amendment will be voted down. Of course, I am violently opposed to the whole thing; but if you are going to pass a bad bill, let the bad in it be as little as possible.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I trust the members of the Committee will not, in the confusion of subsequent arguments, forget the counsel of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL], who opened the debate upon the amendment.

At the time he made his appeal for his amendment, I sought to inject myself into his argument for the purpose of quoting from the hearings. To some of the members of the committee the hearings are available and I call their attention to page 532, volume 2, of the hearings. If they are not available, then the committee report can be secured by sending a page to the Doorkeeper's desk. Secure a copy of the report accompanying the bill and read the comment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MAVERICK] and myself upon this section, to be found on pages 33 and 34 of this report. Members can do this in 1 minute and can reach the essence of the argument which the gentleman from Alabama sought to lay before the committee.

Had he had sufficient time, I think he would have quoted from the hearings. I do not know whether to inflict it upon the Committee at this time, but there is line after line of the admirable, the convincing, and the logical testimony of Dr. Morgan before the committee which proves the justification for the appeal to eliminate this item from the bill through the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, showing why many of these smaller items have been held up to public scorn in a perfectly unjustifiable way, demonstrating how this Tennessee Valley Authority in 97 percent of all its purchases has operated under section 3709, of which there is no more jealous guardian than myself.

I spent a month after my colleagues left the city last summer attending, and at times presiding over, the investigations which the Military Affairs Committee conducted, seeking to guard the provisions of section 3709, designed to protect competitive bidding so far as governmental purchases are concerned.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are exceptions which have been justified in the record from time to time. The Tennessee Valley Authority has found it necessary in the construction of dams, in problems involving intricate engineering problems, and things of that sort, to take immediate action to save the taxpayers' money and to guard the public welfare; yet for this they are to be pilloried by critics who do not tell you the whole truth. Read the record so you can properly judge for yourselves.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama pointed out why it is necessary to guard the discretionary authority of an organization that has responsibility for a great and a tremendous activity. We all respect the work the Comptroller General is doing, but we all likewise realize the red tape involved and the delay that accompanies some of the decisions this office under the law is compelled to hand down.

We also are persuaded from the record itself that for months and months the Comptroller General has had auditors upon the spot, actually in the field, following the activities of the T. V. A., yet they have been steadily falling behind in their work.

If you want to hamstring and cripple this organization, you will resist the Hill amendment; but if you want to defend the very purposes of the original act, as well as the purposes of the legislation before us today, you will support the Hill amendment. It is a vital amendment. Give it to us; let us send the bill to conference as Mr. HILL proposes.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment my committee colleague, the splendid gentleman from Alabama, on the amendment he has offered; not for what he seeks to do with it, but for the shrewd, lawyerlike, capable way in which he has drawn it to accomplish the purpose he wants to accomplish and yet camouflage it. He must have had—and I am persuaded he did have—the assistance of some "brain truster."

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama starts out by putting the whole thing under the supervision of the Comptroller General and then by the shrewdest, keenest, sharpest little knife that ever was injected into a thing he makes provisos and provisos that leaves it entirely to the discretion of the Board of Directors of the Tennessee Valley Authority as to how they shall operate. This is the legal effect of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. Chairman, I want the Committee to understand that while from the very beginning I have said that I was opposed to the Tennessee Valley Authority, that I am not trying to hamstring it in this instance or in any other instance for that matter. The only thing in the world I want, if we are to have a Tennessee Valley Authority, is to have a regulated Tennessee Valley Authority, particularly when it comes to spending the people's money. The Authority is being given hundreds of millions of dollars. They have already spent $102,000,000 and are going to spend hundreds of millions of dollars more. If there is any good or valid reason in the mind of any man in this House why they should not be regulated as are other administrative departments, I should like to hear it. They have a planning commission that costs the taxpayers $30,000 a year down there in the field to plan for them. If this commission cannot plan far enough ahead to take care of a supply part on a cableway across the Tennessee River, then they had better fire their planning commission. [Applause.]

All I am asking, all I am demanding in this instance, is that this bureau be treated just exactly like every other bureau we have. The War Department is under the Comptroller General. You were told by our distinguished chairman yesterday that although we had $30,000 to investigate these very things in the War Department we have only spent $11,000.

We do not want to permit such things to happen down in Tennessee as the letting of a contract, for instance, for a steam shovel to the Bucyrus Shovel Co. for $5,500 more than the Marion Steam Shovel Co., of Marion, Ohio, offered to furnish the same identical shovel, according to specifications. This just involves $5,500 more on one steam shovel. They ought not to be permitted to do such things with the money of the taxpayers in their hands. This bureau ought to be put under the Comptroller General. It ought to be required not only to put its money in the Treasury of the United States, but ought to be required to have that money accounted for just like other bureaus have to account for their money.

Equality before the law is the fundamental principle laid down by the founders of the Democratic Party. Equality of the Tennessee Valley with the War Department, with the Navy Department, and with every other bureau in this great Government should be a principle that we ought to adhere to.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. KELLER. Would the gentleman want to put the Panama Canal under the same rule he is advocating here?

Mr. MAY. I am like the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN]. I am in favor of putting every one of them under the control of the Comptroller General, including all the scores of corporations that are spending the people's money.

Mr. KELLER. Is it the business of an auditor to superintend expenditures or to check up and see whether they have been expended properly?

Mr. MAY. This bill does not provide that he shall check up until the end of the year. It provides that he shall check from time to time.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WILCOX to the amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: In lines 8 and 9 of the amendment strike out the words "in the judgment of the Board" and in line 9 strike out the words "the public exigency" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an emergency which."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I will accept the gentleman's amendment. I hope the gentleman will use his 5 minutes to discuss the amendment as amended.

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, the amendment as amended provides not that the T. V. A. be taken from the supervision of the Comptroller General and not that the T. V. A. is authorized indiscriminately to enter into contracts for the expenditure of public money, but only in certain specific instances is the T. V. A. relieved of the necessity of advertising for bids.

Mr. Chairman, it must be understood that in the conduct of a great business such as we have authorized in the Tennessee Valley, it is impossible for this Authority and the Board of Directors thereof to comply with the infinite detail of advertising in every little transaction that it is engaged in.

I am just as much in favor of the strictest regulation of every agency of this Government as any Member on the floor of the House. I want to see the Tennessee Valley Authority subjected to the closest scrutiny and that not one penny of the public funds is spent except in accordance with the strict provisions of the law. The Hill amendment as now amended does not authorize the indiscriminate expenditure of funds, but simply authorizes the Board to proceed under three conditions without submitting to public bids.

The first is, as the amendment is amended, in case of an emergency which requires immediate action. I am sure that the Members of the House realize that in this great undertaking a great many emergencies may exist which will not permit of the advertisement of bids before important work may be undertaken. For instance, suppose that an earthquake or a storm or something else happened which would wreck one of these great dams or one of these great power houses and immediate action would be necessary. Certainly this Board under such conditions should be authorized to proceed at once without waiting for the necessity of advertising for bids before installing the necessary repairs in order to proceed with the business in hand. The second thing that is authorized is where the services contracted for amount to less than $500. Certainly we cannot expect this Board every time that it wants to buy $100 worth of supplies to stop and shut down, and in order to buy a piece of machinery to replace a piece that has broken down to advertise for bids before making the purchase. Under the strict regulations of the act, before they could buy a monkey wrench, before they could buy a piece of cable, before they could buy a single part or accessory, dynamo, engine, or boiler, it would be necessary to advertise for bids and go through all of the detail that is specified by the section of the Revised Statutes referred to in the bill as it now stands.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILCOX. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The gentleman from Kentucky made a statement that I fear may lead the Committee to believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN] is against the amendment which I have offered. I am authorized by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUCHANAN], Chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to say that he will vote for my amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. WILCOX. Mr. Chairman, a great deal of criticism has been aimed at the members of the Board because of the exercise of their judgment and discretion. I am perfectly frank to say to the Members of the House that I would not have supported this amendment as long as it was left in the discretion of the Board to say when an exigency existed requiring action without advertisement. I offered my amendment eliminating the provisions authorizing the exercise of discretion by the Board because I am opposed to leaving the expenditure of public money in their discretion; but as the amendment now stands, the discretion of the Board has been removed, and only an emergency requiring immediate action will permit it to proceed with a contract without advertising in according with the law, and I believe the amendment, as amended, should be adopted by the House.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I must ask my colleagues please not to interrupt me with questions, because I think I shall cover the entire ground. I hope I may, even though the time be limited.

I wish to announce that if this amendment is voted down I shall then offer an amendment, in line 16, page 12, to change the date July 1, 1936, to July 1, 1938, so that the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes shall not apply until that time in connection with the purchase of supplies and equipment necessary for dam construction. I think that during the 3 years they surely could finish the dams now under way, and this will meet every objection that has been raised, because if that is the case section 3709 will not apply to all the points and propositions suggested in the arguments of my good friend here.

Now, in answer to the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, I have a letter here from the General Accounting Office to the effect that the General Accounting Office does audit the accounts of the Panama Canal and audits them at the Panama Canal.

Mr. KELLER. Certainly it does, but it does not supervise expenditures.

Mr. McSWAIN. I have stated it just as it is, and I cannot be interrupted.

Let me say one thing further. When I came here in 1921 the first important piece of legislation was the adoption of the General Accounting Act. I was converted then that that was the only proper way to disburse public money and I have not got away from that idea to this day.

I said yesterday that I did not bring this proposal up myself, but when it was brought up and I was confronted with it, in order to be consistent with my principles, I had to support it. Now, how did it come up? In response to a letter from my good friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr.

BUCHANAN], the letter being printed in the RECORD here, I visited his office and after talking over this general situation, beginning first with the chemicals to destroy noxious weeds, he called up Mr. McCarl at my suggestion and asked for appropriate language to bring the Tennessee Valley Authority under the law, and as a result of that, this language was submitted to the committee.

I see by the public press that it has been suggested that Mr. McCarl, lately, for the purpose of self-exploitation, has expressed views with regard to this general proposition that perhaps he did not entertain heretofore. I call your attention to his published report for the year 1928 in which he said to the Congress:

As proposals come before the Congress from time to time for the organization of corporations for the conduct of some public business, that is, for the administration of certain laws, it is earnestly recommended that full and adequate provision be made for publicity in the financial transactions of such corporations, by the requirement that they account through the General Accounting Office to the Congress for their expenditures of public money.

This was in 1928 and in 1929——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one correction?

Mr. McSWAIN. For a correction only; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. General McCarl audits all the funds that Congress appropriates for the Panama Canal, but he does not audit the receipts of the Panama Railroad and the Panama Steamship Co., although he should audit them, and the time is going to come when he will audit them before we get through.

Mr. McSWAIN. I have not been down there, but according to his letter, he does audit them.

Mr. KELLER. He does audit them.

Mr. BLANTON. But not all the receipts.

Mr. McSWAIN. I am going by the records, you gentlemen are going by your recollections.

Mr. BLANTON. I am referring to records. I know what General Schley has testified to before our committee.

I quote the following from the testimony of Col. Julian L. Schley, Governor of the Panama Canal, January 11, 1935, as shown on page 60 of the printed hearings held by our Committee on Appropriations for the War Department, part 2, to wit:

SUPERVISION OF EXPENDITURES BY OFFICE OF COMPTROLLER GENERAL

Mr. BLANTON. Why is it that all of your business operations do not regularly come under the Comptroller General of the United States?

Governor SCHLEY. They do, sir; but the railroad does not.

Mr. BLANTON. Why do you not follow them absolutely? That is what the Navy Department and the War Department have to do.

Governor SCHLEY. Yes, sir; but the activity is entirely different. In the case of the Panama Railroad we are not merely a disbursing department for which an appropriation is made from which expenditures are made during the year.

All forms of business are transacted, and there are large amounts of procurement, and they render all kinds of services from which revenue is received. There are many things concerning which, if we followed closely the Treasury regulations as to procurement, it would be very difficult to carry on the business.

Mr. BLANTON. Sometimes it is to the interest of the people of the United States that these obstacles are set up by the Comptroller General.

Governor SCHLEY. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should we not place that under his absolute control?

Governor SCHLEY. It would really hamper this business, undoubtedly, because it is not the same kind of business as is done by a department.

Mr. BLANTON. Your receipts aggregated $42,971,324; that is, your total revenues.

Governor SCHLEY. That is, the railroad?

Mr. BOLTON. If that is the case, why does the General Accounting Office report to the committee in charge of the independent offices appropriation bill that the Panama Railroad and the Panama Steamship Co. accounts are not audited by them?

I have before me the report given by the Comptroller General's Office last week to the subcommittee in charge of the independent offices appropriation bill, in which a list is given of the activities which do not submit accounts to the General Accounting Office for audit, and in that report there is listed the Panama Railroad Co. and the Panama Steamship Co.

Mr. BLANTON. Why should not that $11,000,000,000 be regularly audited by the Comptroller General, or the General Accounting Office?

Governor SCHLEY. It is not a question of auditing that. We have no objection to their going through our accounts at any time.

Mr. BLANTON. I am not talking about that, Governor. I am talking about the question, Why should not that be placed under the same jurisdiction of the General Accounting Office as other offices and departments of the Government are, with the same authority over it exercised by Comptroller General McCarl that he exercises over the War Department, the Navy Department, the Treasury Department, and every other department of the Government.

Governor SCHLEY. We should not have applied to us all of the minute restrictions placed on purely disbursing departments.

Mr. BLANTON. They are applied to the Treasury Department, they are applied to the United States Army, and they are applied to the United States Navy.

Governor SCHLEY. But they are not conducting a real business such as we are.

If you will examine page 65 of part 2 of said hearings, you will see that during the last fiscal year, from 25 different businesses operated there by it, the Panama Canal took in receipts of $15,858,697.27. I maintain that its railroad and its steamship company and all of its business should be regularly audited by the Comptroller General.

Mr. McSWAIN. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, a carbon copy of a letter dated December 28, 1929, addressed by General McCarl to the Honorable William Williamson, who was Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments, in which he then proposed language to this effect:

That hereafter there shall be applicable and controlling in the matter of expenditure of and accounting for all moneys of corporations whose capital stock is owned by the United States, including corporations whose capital stock, with exception of qualifying shares, is owned by the United States, all of the laws of the United States which are now or may hereafter be generally applicable and controlling in the expenditure and accounting for public moneys by the executive departments and independent establishments of the United States Government.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Florida to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment, as amended.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SHORT and Mr. McLEAN) there were 140 ayes and 106 noes.

Mr. WADSWORTH and Mr. McLEAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. HILL of Alabama and Mr. McLEAN.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were 162 ayes and 120 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That section 12 of said act of May 18, 1933, being Public Law No. 17, Seventy-third Congress, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: That the period at the end of said section be stricken out and a colon inserted in lieu thereof, and that the following language be added: "And provided further, That no such transmission line or lines shall duplicate any existing transmission line or lines; and to avoid such duplication, if the Board deems the acquisition of such line or lines necessary, the Board shall first negotiate for the use or purchase of such duplicate parallel line or lines, and in the event of failure to agree upon a satisfactory price, condemnation proceedings shall thereupon be resorted to."

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, beginning with line 1, strike out all of section 14.

Mr. HILL of Alabama was recognized.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. McSWAIN. As I understand, the motion now pending to strike out section 14, and a motion which will later be offered by the gentleman from Alabama to insert, will be the only controversial matters remaining in the bill, and if I am correctly informed there will not be much controversy over the section to be inserted.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think all on this side will agree to that amendment.

Mr. McSWAIN. Then why cannot we limit the amount of debate on section 14? I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, section 14 provides that the Tennessee Valley Authority cannot build what is termed a "duplicate transmission line" to another existing line, and that if the Tennessee Valley Authority needs a transmission line it must first go and negotiate with the private power company, and see if that private power company will be so good and kind as to sell to the Tennessee Valley Authority its line.

Then if the private power company does not see fit to sell its line under section 14 the Tennessee Valley Authority is forced to go into court and condemn the line. The Authority would have no other recourse whatever but to go into court, with all the attendant uncertainties and delays that occur in condemnation proceedings.

Of course, there could be no better way, and the opponents of the Tennessee Valley Authority could have no better way of thwarting and defeating this project than to retain section 14 in the bill.

The private power companies have long since preempted the territory. Their transmission lines cover the States of Alabama, Georgia, and Tennessee like the morning dew, and it would be impossible for the Tennessee Valley Authority to build any kind of transmission line that someone could not say duplicated a line such as is prohibited under the language of section 14. If we are to sell the power, if we are to get our money back on the investments we are making in the dams, we must have transmission lines. It happens that in the past the transmission lines that the Tennessee Valley Authority has acquired have been bought from private power companies by the Authority, but the Authority has had the right to build lines if necessary, and has been under no compulsion to go into court and condemn lines. Had they been under the necessity of going into court and condemning those lines, of course, the power companies would never have sold the lines and the Tennessee Valley Authority would be in condemnation proceedings in court today, and heaven only knows when they would get out of court and get possession of the lines. During the 12 years that the Wilson Dam stood there, with much of the power going over the dam to waste, the Government was forced to sell what power it could to the Alabama Power Co. for 2 mills a kilowatt, while the Alabama Power Co. sold that power to the consumer for 7, 9, and 10 cents a kilowatt, because the Government had no transmission lines to get the power away from the dam and as a consequence had to take whatever price the Alabama Power Co. offered for the power.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 1 minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will point out that unless his amendment is adopted any talk of a yardstick becomes a pure mockery.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Any talk of a yardstick becomes a pure mockery—the whole project is defeated, and you may as well junk and scrap the whole thing, you may just as well do what our friends over here on the Republican side want to do, that is, kill the whole thing. On the contrary, let us adopt the amendment, take this fatal provision out of the bill, and save the great project. [Applause.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I am now past 60 years of age. Having told that, I want to tell another thing. I never commenced a battle in my life that I ever deserted or quit until it was finished, and I do not propose to quit now. I never deserted the ship in any storm, however fierce, and I never will. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL] will perhaps carry in this House, but I am going to tell you, and I am going to tell you now, that it is the first time that openly, notoriously, and unequivocally a Member of this House has declared for the policy of putting the Government of the United States into the power business outright. It is the first time I have ever been asked to vote to shut the doors of the courts against any citizen of the United States. The first time it was stated by any member of the Tennessee Valley Authority was in their last annual report, and there they said they were going to take in certain territory and that territory includes the States of Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and a part of Kentucky, and ultimately the whole United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of South Carolina. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. No. It was in their annual report that they cannot make money because they have not the market unless they can get a city the size of Memphis, Nashville, Louisville, or Cincinnati. What does this mean? This means that in the State of Tennessee alone, in the home city of the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, there has already been taken out of taxation property to the value of $5,000,000 in the form of preferred stocks of the national banks of the city of Nashville, which I am told by the assessor of that city means $300,000 of revenue a year to the city.

In addition to that, when you buy a municipal plant in every town in the States of Tennessee, Alabama, and Mississippi, you are going to take out of taxation $300,000,000 of taxable values, and that means about $8,800,000 in taxes paid each of the three States by private property owners. You are going to dry up the sources of taxation just because you say you want to establish a yardstick. I am in favor of bringing the rates of power companies down to the lowest figure on which they can exist and make a reasonable profit, but the way to do it is by regulation, and not by spending hundreds of millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money in a venture that is wild, reckless, unwise, and extravagant in an effort to establish a dishonest yardstick, and that is exactly what you propose to do when you put the Government of the United States in the business of buying transmission lines.

Let me show you what else you do. Under every law that I ever read in my life, there is no way to take the property of a private citizen away from him except by due process of law, and that means trial in court before a jury, at which he can have a hearing, and yet this amendment provides that the Tennessee Valley Authority can fix a value on your property and take it away from you without due process of law, in violation of the Constitution of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I did not intend to participate in this debate, and had it not been for the amazing speech of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] I should have remained silent.

The building of these transmission lines is absolutely necessary, not only for the Tennessee Valley Authority to operate but to complete the dams they are now building.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] exercises himself because, forsooth, he says you are taking off the tax rolls transmission lines and distribution lines in the States of Mississippi, Tennessee, and Alabama. I perhaps know as much about that as any other man in this House. [Applause.]

Now, this is not to force anybody to sell, but it is to give the Tennessee Valley Authority the right to build lines, if necessary. In the State of Mississippi they purchased some lines and sold them back to the county electric power associations or to the municipalities, and they are on the tax rolls, paying taxes today. Those people are satisfied. They are given an opportunity to get their power rates down to what they should be.

Now, do not deceive yourselves. If you want to help the Power Trust destroy the Tennessee Valley Authority and destroy the hope of the American people for cheaper electric lights and power rates, and destroy the hopes of your children for the enjoyment of electric energy, one of the greatest natural resources the world has known, then vote against the Hill amendment; but if you want the Tennessee Valley Authority to live, if you want to continue to bring these rates down to where the American people can enjoy them, vote for the Hill amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I want the Membership to remember that this bill with this provision in it was reported to this House upon the vote of 13 Democrats. Not a Republican voted for this bill in the committee. It took 13 Democrats. I submit that this provision is not altogether unreasonable, and it is somewhat in line with what your committee 2 years ago wrote into the bill that it reported to this House and which this House adopted. This House adopted it, but it is more in keeping with justice and fairness than was the provision of 2 years ago. It is true it was stricken out in conference. Two years ago we merely provided that before building a duplicate line, the Authority should negotiate. Now we provide that if they negotiate and fail to agree upon a price, they shall not go ahead and build a competing line, destroy a competing line, destroy the line they are duplicating, but since they say it is necessary and that they need it in their business, they shall condemn it in the courts, and buy it and pay for it. That is all it means. Is there anything unfair about going to the courts? They have said here, "Oh, we cannot go to the courts." I will subscribe to a great many things to get an agreement and harmony, but I cannot subscribe to this proposition that the doors of the courts of this country shall ever be closed to anybody. [Applause.]

So that it is only carrying out the policy that the directors themselves, in a spirit of fairness, say they have been conducting. The directors themselves testified time and time again before the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations, and I will read simply a brief extract from Mr. Lilienthal's testimony at page 775, volume 2, of the testimony:

Mr. LILIENTHAL. The Board, from the outset, has had a policy, that in the carrying out of the electricity part of this program, it should be done without injury to private investment, if that can possibly be done.

As a corollary of that, the Board, from the very outset, adopted a policy against the duplication of facilities, a policy which was extensively discussed, as I recall, before this committee and on the floor of Congress, at the time of the passage of this act; a policy that would prevent, if possible, through our good offices and through our own action, where that was relevant, the construction of two plants in the same community where one was adequate to perform the service.

They say that is their policy. That is good business. It is good common sense. I commend them for it, and we are only asking the Congress to ratify their own conduct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAY) there were—ayes 130, noes 102.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILL of Alabama: Add a new section to the bill, to be known as "section 14" and to read as follows:

"SEC. 14. That said act of May 18, 1933, being Public Law No. 17, Seventy-third Congress, be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding after section 26 of said act a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 26. (a) The unified development and regulation of the Tennessee River system requires that no dam, appurtenant works, or other obstruction, affecting navigation, flood control, or public lands or reservations, shall be constructed, and thereafter operated or maintained across, along, or in the said river or any of its tributaries until plans for such construction, operation, and maintenance shall have been submitted to and approved by the Board; and the construction, commencement of construction, operation, or maintenance of such structures without such approval is hereby prohibited. When such plans shall have been approved, deviation therefrom either before or after completion of such structures is prohibited unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and approved by the Board.

"'In the event the Board shall, within 60 days after their formal submission to the Board, fail to approve any plans or modifications as the case may be, for construction, operation, or maintenance of any such structures on the Little Tennessee River, the above requirements shall be deemed satisfied, if upon application to the Secretary of War, with due notice to the Corporation, and hearing thereon, such plans or modifications are approved by the said Secretary of War as reasonably adequate and effective for the unified development and regulation of the Tennessee River system.

"'Such construction, commencement of construction, operation, or maintenance of any structures or parts thereof in violation of the provisions of this section may be prevented, and the removal or discontinuation thereof required by the injunction or order of any district court exercising jurisdiction in any district in which such structures or parts thereof may be situated, and the Corporation is hereby authorized to bring appropriate proceedings to this end.

"'The requirements of this section shall not be construed to be a substitute for the requirements of any other law of the United States, or of any State, now in effect or hereafter enacted, but shall be in addition thereto, so that any approval, license, permit, or other sanction now or hereafter required by the provisions of any such law for the construction, operation, or maintenance of any structures whatever, except such as may be constructed, operated, or maintained by the Corporation, shall be required, notwithstanding the provisions of this section.'"

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment that it is not germane to any section of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kentucky desires to present his views on the point of order, the Chair will be glad to hear him.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the Committee is a bill relating solely to a governmental corporation, the Tennessee Valley Authority. The previous sections of the bill—in fact, all the sections that have been considered, relate solely to the regulation of the Tennessee Valley Authority. The amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama is not germane to any provision of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act but seeks to add legislative provisions already carried in the Federal Water Power Act, which is not before the House and which has no relation to this measure.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, does the Chair care to hear me on the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. DRIVER). The Chair does not care to hear argument from the gentleman from Alabama.

From an examination of the original T. V. A. Act it is apparent that there was committed to the organization created by that act a measure of control over the Tennessee River and the structures thereon, including such as were provided for in that original act. The pending bill amends the original act in several particulars, and the pending amendment seeks to add an additional section to the original act dealing with structures erected and to be erected in the river committed to the Authority created by the original act. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is germane to the bill, and, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a brief statement, not 5 minutes——

Mr. MAVERICK. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Time for debate was fixed by express order of the House. All time under that order has been exhausted.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. MAVERICK. It breaks my heart, but I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McFARLANE. I make the point of order that the gentleman's amendment is not in writing, and is, therefore, out of order.

Mr. BLANTON. And it is not in proper form.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause, which motion I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MAY moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this amendment is really the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] and not the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been reported at the instance of the gentleman from Kentucky.

The point of order is overruled.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, may I say that the language of the amendment proposed to be inserted as section 14 is substantially the language of section 11 of H. R. 8525, which was prepared in a conference of Democratic members of the committee? The only change that is worthy of mentioning is: Whereas in 8527 the final power was vested in the Federal Power Commission, under the amendment here, after a conference with all parties that were at issue, so far as I know, and after conference with the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina, who represents the district where this Little Tennessee River is located, the authority was transferred from the Federal Power Commission to the Secretary of War, and we all know that the Secretary of War will rely upon the advice of the Chief of Engineers in a matter of that sort.

In reference to what has been done in the Little Tennessee River Valley may I say that we have already passed and approved a provision on page 11, lines 8, 9, 10, and 11, which provides that any land purchased by the Authority and not necessary to carry out its plans and projects actually decided upon shall be sold by the Authority, as the agent of the United States, after due advertisement at public auction to the highest bidder. Unless they can show a sustaining proposition that whatever they bought in the Little Tennessee River Valley is necessary for the projects decided upon, it will be their duty, if this bill is enacted into law, to sell such land.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] to strike the enacting clause.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] to strike the enacting clause.

The motion was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HILL].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DRIVER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933, pursuant to House Resolution 279, he reported the same back to the House with sundry amendments agreed to in Committee.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment striking out section 14 on page 14.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment upon which a separate vote is demanded.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 1, strike out all of the section 14.

Mr. McLEAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIERMANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BIERMANN. There were two amendments to section 14. Which one are we voting on now?

The SPEAKER. The amendment strikes out section 14.

Mr. BIERMANN. As it is in the original bill.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. As I understand it, the question on which we are to vote is the amendment which struck from the bill section 14, which was the transmission-line section.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky rise?

Mr. MAY. I rose to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAY. There was so much confusion at the time the gentleman from New Jersey offered his amendment that I did not understand what it was.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment in order that the Members may understand exactly what is before the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 1, strike out all of section 14.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAY. The amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey, as I understand it, moves to strike out all of section 14. Does that relate to the original section 14 as reported by the House Committee and as contained in the House bill?

The SPEAKER. It relates to the section in the bill as reported to the House.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, there was no amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey. The gentleman from New Jersey simply demanded a separate vote on my amendment to strike out section 14.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House understands the situation.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 237, nays 145, not voting 47, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. RYAN, is unavoidably absent. If he had been present he would have voted "aye."

Mr. DRISCOLL. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. SNYDER, was called away and could not be present. If present, he would have voted "aye."

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BERLIN, has been call out of town. If present, he would have voted "aye."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDREWS of New York moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to that committee to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Page 11, line 23, strike out all of section 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 13. That section 9 (b) of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: and as so amended such amendment shall be effective on and after the 1st day of January 1936 occurring next after the approval hereof, by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"'(b) All moneys of the Corporation of whatsoever nature hereafter received by or for the Corporation shall be immediately and without diminution deposited and covered into the Treasury of the United States, and such portion thereof as is authorized by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, as amended, or other law, to be used by said Corporation in carrying out the provisions of said act, as amended, shall be transferred to an appropriate appropriation account withdrawable only on warrant as are other appropriated public moneys, and subject to authority specifically granted by the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, and as amended, all laws regulating the obligating or expenditure of other public moneys shall be applicable thereto: Provided, That until July 1, 1936, the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, shall not be applicable to purchases of supplies and equipment necessary for dam construction. Accounts of all transactions involving receipts or disbursements of the Corporation shall be duly rendered to the General Accounting Office at such times and in such substance and form as may be prescribed by the Comptroller General of the United States, and said accounts and such claims as may arise shall be settled and adjusted by the General Accounting Office under and pursuant to the provisions of title III of the Budget and Accounting Act approved June 10, 1921: Provided, That the expenses of such portion of the audit as the Comptroller General may authorize to be done in the field shall be paid from moneys advanced therefor by the Corporation, or from any appropriation or appropriations for the General Accounting Office, and appropriations so used shall be reimbursed promptly by the Corporation as billed by the Comptroller General. In such connection the Comptroller General and his representatives shall have free and open access to all papers, books, records, files, accounts, plants, warehouses, offices, and all other things, property, and places belonging to, under the control of, or used or employed by the Corporation, and shall be afforded full facilities for counting all cash and verifying transactions with the balances in depositaries. The officers of the Corporation to whom moneys may be advanced on accountable warrant shall each give a bond to the United States for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office according to law in such amount as shall be directed by the Comptroller General. Should there be any administrative delinquency in the rendering of the accounts as directed, or any unsatisfactory condition of the accounts, requisitions for funds shall be disapproved by the Comptroller General unless, for good cause shown, he shall elect to withhold such disapproval.'"

Mr. ANDREWS of New York (interrupting the reading of the motion to recommit). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the motion to recommit as it is the McCarl amendment.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to recommit that the House has just voted on these two propositions.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is unable to rule on the point of order without having the motion read.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the motion to recommit.

Mr. KVALE (interrupting the reading of the motion to recommit). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of the motion to recommit be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order on the motion to recommit that the House has just acted on what is in the motion.

The first part of the motion to recommit deals with lines 4, 5, and 6 on page 8 of the bill. The House adopted an amendment striking out those lines.

In the same way, as to section 13, the House has just adopted an amendment striking out section 13 and substituting in lieu thereof the language now in the bill.

The House has therefore passed on both of the propositions embodied in the motion to recommit.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that the motion to recommit is not identical with the original language on page 8. The language on page 8 reads "after July 1, 1937", while the motion to recommit states "after July 1, 1938." So it is not the original language of the bill and it is not the amendment that has been acted upon by the House but matter that was acted upon simply in committee.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. The House adopted all the amendments in gross except the amendment to strike out section 14, which the gentleman from New Jersey asked a separate vote upon. The point of order is that the motion to recommit is in substance what the House voted on.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MICHENER. The gentleman says "in substance." That is just the point; there is a vast difference between 1937 and 1938. If they had 1 year to operate on a different basis, that is very material.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. There can be no question but that section 13 was voted upon.

Mr. MICHENER. There is a vast difference; a difference that is very material.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York on the second portion of his motion to recommit.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. The Chair rules that the first portion of the motion to recommit is in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the first portion is in order, inasmuch as there is a difference in date.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. The language of the second portion is identical with what was originally in section 13, but it has not been voted on by the House, only by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, insofar as it applies to section 13, the House having voted to strike out section 13 and insert other language. The gentleman's motion proposes to reinsert the original language in the bill, which by a former vote was stricken out. The Chair thinks that portion of the motion to recommit is subject to a point of order.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask to amend the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. ANDREWS of New York moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs with instructions to report the same back with the following amendment: "Page 8, line 4, after the word 'agriculture', strike out the remainder of section 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following: 'After July 1, 1938, the Authority shall not sell surplus power or chemicals produced by it below the cost of the aggregate production for each year.'"

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I submit a unanimous-consent request that it may be in order on Friday next to take up the Private Calendar under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that it may be in order on Friday next to consider the Private Calendar under the rules of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, though I do not intend to. I do this to ask if the gentleman refers to bills unobjected to.

The SPEAKER. Yes. It is under the general rules of the House.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object merely for the purpose of stating that I hope that on a further vote we may drive through to final passage the bill under consideration tonight.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. HOPE. This is not to take up omnibus bills?

The SPEAKER. No. Omnibus bills come up on their regular day. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. DARDEN, for 14 days, on account of official naval business;

To Mr. BURNHAM, for 14 days, on account of official business;

To Mr. CHANDLER, for 3 days, on account of important business;

To Mr. HIGGINS of Connecticut, for 14 days, on account of official business;

To Mr. McGRATH, for 14 days, on account of official naval business;

To Mr. O'CONNELL, for 14 days, on account of official business;

To Mr. SCOTT, indefinitely, on account of important official business;

To Mr. SCRUGHAM, for 14 days, on account of official naval business;

To Mr. SEARS, for 14 days, on account of official business; and

To Mr. MAAS, for 14 days, on account of important official business.

PAST AND PRESENT REVENUE LAWS HAVE GREATLY BENEFITED THE RICH—LET US AMEND THESE LAWS—STOP ALL LOOPHOLES AND RAISE FUTURE REVENUE BASED ON ABILITY TO PAY

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit for your consideration my reasons why certain bills which I have introduced in the House should be favorably reported by the Ways and Means Committee. The bills to which I refer are H. R. 8401 amending section 12 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1934 relating to rates of surtax; H. R. 8402, amending section 405 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1934 relating to rates of tax on estates; and H. R. 8403, amending section 520 of the Revenue Act of 1934 relating to rates of tax on gifts. I also wish to call to your attention my Resolution No. 98 proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States relative to taxing certain incomes which is in harmony with the President's tax message of recent date.

Let me say in the beginning that I realize that the above-mentioned bills do not precisely agree with the general ideas advanced by the President in his message to Congress on June 19. The President in his suggestions asked for revision of taxation on inheritances, gifts, and for a graduated income tax on corporations according to their size, whereas the above measures call for a revision upward on estates and gift taxes commensurate with the rates of other countries and for a revision of the personal income tax rates placing a ceiling on personal incomes of not to exceed $1,000 per week or about $52,000 net per year.

I respectfully ask the Ways and Means Committee to consider these measures on their merits, bearing in mind that the President has made only general suggestions regarding tax rates on the subjects covered.

INCOME TAX

The income-tax schedule which I propose in H. R. 8401 materially increases the amount of the tax in the case of all taxpayers. A comparison of the tax raised under this measure with that of Great Britain, France, and Germany is as follows:

Comparison of income tax—Married person, no dependents, all income from salary

Net income	H. R. 8401	Great Britain	France	Germany
$1,000	0	$8.88	$33.78	$79.05
$2,000	0	111.44	170.10	316.85
$3,000	$8.00	311.44	365.85	543.54
$5,000	85.00	711.44	857.30	1,079.54
$7,500	230.00	1,221.94	1,651.30	1,951.95
$10,000	440.00	1,862.34	2,524.94	2,939.89
$15,000	1,049.00	3,443.85	4,688.28	5,170.49
$25,000	3,049.00	7,368.90	9,509.83	9,946.04
$50,000	12,516.50	19,654.60	23,716.05	22,565.71
$100,000	50,204.00	48,101.85	53,651.12	47,445.63
$500,000	463,866.50	307,909.85	269,651.12	247,435.73
$1,000,000	961,366.50	639,159.85	539,651.12	497,446.16

The rate schedule is so drawn in H. R. 8401 that the amount of income remaining in the hands of any taxpayer cannot exceed approximately $50,000. Surtax rates begin at 1 percent upon the first $1,000 in excess of the exemption plus $2,000. The rate of tax upon the portion of net income in excess of $50,000 is 99½ percent.

BENEFITS DERIVED FROM LIMITING INCOMES TO $50,000

(a) Presents unhealthy increase in prices and removes incentive to reduce wages

Such an amendment to our tax laws would peacefully and orderly bring about a redistribution of our national wealth. These amendments would soon be reflected to both the consumer and producer. Businessmen who are prone to reduce wages or oppose their increase, would not find it advantageous to do so if the resultant savings when beyond their reasonable needs was taken from them in taxes. Likewise, the incentive to reap excess profits by increasing the selling price would cease to exist. Instead, the tendency would be to maintain good wages, shorten hours, and decrease prices to the lowest point compatible with this maximum possible personal income. The increased wages, shorter hours, and decreased selling prices would automatically benefit the whole community by increasing employment and buying power.

(b) Would stimulate legitimate business

Such a tax would not only eliminate profiteering but would stimulate legitimate business and profits. By taxing only personal incomes, and not business profits, a handicap would be removed from business. Untaxed, undivided profits would be available for development and expansion made necessary by the increased buying power and higher wages and more employment. The accumulation of deferred dividends or undivided profits beyond the reasonable needs of the business would be prevented by safeguards which you placed in the Revenue Act of 1934 and which we hope will be more effectively administered by this administration than similar provisions found in prior revenue acts were enforced under the Mellon regime.

(c) Would remove the incentive for unreasonable increases in officers' salaries

The Federal Trade Commission has been engaged in compiling data on the salaries of some of the larger corporations. Under date of February 27, 1934, the Evening Star of this city quoted an article from the Associated Press to the effect that this study disclosed that out of 900 big companies around 300 executives were receiving more than $100,000 in 1929 in bonuses and salaries. In the boom period about two score received pay checks and bonuses of $200,000. Some 25 got between $200,000 and $300,000; 7 more got between $300,000 and $400,000; 3 between $700,000 and $800,000; 2 between $800,000 and $900,000; 1 something over a million and another more than a million and a half.

A conspicuous example was that of the president of the American Tobacco Co. who between 1929 and 1932 received in bonuses and salary $3,000,000. Another case was that of the president of the Bethlehem Steel Co. whose annual salary from 1928 to 1930 was $12,000 annually but whose bonuses averaged $1,100,000 per annum. A more glowing example was that of an executive of Fox Film Co. who received a salary and bonus of $460,000. Shortly thereafter the company under his management was in financial difficulties.

While I have not sufficient data to establish this statement, it is generally conceded by those in position to have a knowledge of industry that salaries were increased from 1916 to 1929 by several hundred percent. In most instances these increases were not justified on the basis of additional duties. The additional pay in no sense represents earned incomes, but are paid by reason of the fact that these individuals are able to dominate and control oftentimes with very little actual ownership of the business. The excessive salaries which they receive represent accumulated profits diverted from the stockholders into their pockets. The salary of the President of this country is only $75,000. I believe no officer in commercial enterprises should receive more.

(d) Would take from these individuals the means by which they accumulate unreasonable wealth

The executives of large corporations for the most part are in a position to have inside information about the possibilities of profits from trading not only in their own stock but that of other companies dominated by friends and associates in like positions. Much of the profits from capital gains reported by wealthy men undoubtedly was the result of confidential information reaching them by reason of their position in the financial world before such information trickled down to the public. The exhorbitant salaries and bonuses is the starting point frequently by which enormous amounts of wealth are accumulated from trading in stocks of this kind. The officers of General Motors, Chrysler, and Studebaker are said to have amassed large sums in this manner.

(e) Will remove numerous economic evils

Many economic evils and practices that are common under the present system would not be practical or profitable with such a progressive personal income tax. Holding companies, trusts, monopolies, and other devices for making and covering up excess profits would be of no avail. All such profits would ultimately be passed on as personal income and so would be available for taxation.

The temptation to water stock would be much lessened. Stocks are watered so that a few at the top may reap a bounteous harvest without giving anything in return. What would be the advantage of such manipulation if most, or all, of the profits reverted to the people through taxation?

The proposed tax would make large holdings of unproductive natural resources unprofitable or impossible and so help to restore such resources to the people. It would tend also to break up all large fortunes and holdings however owned or controlled. We would have no millionaires or wealthy playboys, also fewer paupers.

The perennial warfare between labor and capital would be largely avoided by such tax. Labor troubles are usually due to the desire of the employed for a more equitable share of the profits of industry. Given such a share the conflict should cease.

Undue political influence and power that so often goes along with great fortunes and incomes would naturally be much less when such fortunes and incomes no longer exist.

Such a tax would take the excess profits out of the munitions and ship-building industries. It would thus help to eliminate one of the potent factors that tends to promote war.

(f) Would not deprive industry of competent leadership

Would such a tax and such a limitation of personal income deprive us of the services of our great industrial leaders? Would competent men refuse to work for such a pittance? We need have no misgivings about not being able to secure the services of competent men in any line or for any job for an income of $50,000 per year. The net salary of the President is about $50,000. Our Congressmen, Cabinet members, Supreme Court Justices, and business executives all receive less than $25,000 per year. Competent men are found in every line of work who do not receive that much. In fact, all of our so-called "industrial leaders" have worked for less, and would gladly do so again if necessary.

Let us suppose such a one should refuse to work for a paltry $50,000 per year. What would he do? Retire to his million-dollar estate and live off his income? Well, as that income could not be over $50,000 per year, he would not be able to pay taxes and upkeep on that million-dollar estate very long. As a result, the estate would have to be sold. This, of course, would be very desirable. The land would then be available for small-home owners. A number of small-home owners is a far greater asset to any community than is one large estate.

(g) Would not cause an exodus of wealth

Nor need we fear that our millionaires would take their wealth and the country. If they did leave they would not be missed. They could take with them little of real value. Our industries and resources would have to be left behind.

(h) Evasion would decrease

Would the possessors of swollen incomes try to evade such a tax? Probably so. Many of them try to now, and they often get by with it. Under the proposed plan such evasion would be more difficult. The greater the income the more numerous the sources from which it is derived and the more complicated and difficult it is to uncover. A limited income would naturally be derived from a smaller number of sources and so would be much easier to check. Requiring all corporations and employers to report the wages, salaries, bonuses, and dividends paid to all employees, stockholders, and officials would reduce evasion to a minimum. Anyone found spending money clearly in excess of his reported income would, of course, be subject for special investigation.

Some will say it sounds all right, but the people would never stand for such a tax. Well, that depends on what is meant by the people. Under the proposed plan, as under the present one, only a small percent of the voters would pay any income tax at all. The rate on the lower incomes, $4,000 or less above exemptions, would be less than now. We might conservatively conclude that less than 1 percent of the people would then pay more income tax than at the present. The other 99 percent and all the non-income-tax payers would profit either directly or indirectly. If properly presented to the people, their own self-interest should cause them to approve such a tax.

SUMMARY

As stated before, the amount of the tax suggested, 1 percent on the first $1,000 above exemptions and increasing 1 percent with each additional $1,000, is purely arbitrary and may be adjusted to meet the needs of the Treasury Department for income. The practical working of such a plan is the point stressed. To be effective the tax must progressively increase so that excess profits will result in a diminished personal income. A lesser tax, such as our present income tax, is shifted to the consumer (italics mine) and so will not produce the desired result.

I realize that the income-tax law is full of exemptions and deductions favorable to wealthy taxpayers. Many of these deductions permit the taxpayer to retain, free of tax, large amounts of actual profits. The limitation, therefore, of $50,000 is far less than the taxpayer will be permitted to retain under the existing law. For example, the capital-gain provision exempts from tax as high as 70 percent of the profits realized from the sale of stocks and bonds and other property. Statistical data of the Bureau of Internal Revenue indicate that wealthy taxpayers have a very large percentage of their net income from this source. It is commonly known that these gentlemen buy stocks, bonds, and real estate when the markets are depressed and the public has little cash for this purpose.

These investments are held until prosperous times, when the markets are inflated, and their investments are then liquidated at excessive prices, a large portion of property sold by this class falls into the hands of small investors, who oftentimes lose much of their hard-earned money in the recessions of the market, when the shrewd investor can buy them up again for another cycle of investment. I see no reason for retaining such loopholes in the law, but if they are to be retained the rate of tax should be exceedingly heavy on that portion of the income subject to tax, for the profits they receive from these investments are not truly earned but represent the wealth of many small investors who are stripped of their savings, which are transferred to the wealthy individual who can take advantage of the economic condition of the times.

ESTATE TAX

In the case of estates, H. R. 8402 proposes a schedule beginning with 2 percent on the first $10,000 in excess of the exemption of $50,000 provided by the revenue act and is graduated upward to a rate of 99½ percent on net incomes in excess of $20,000,000. The rate schedule is so drawn that regardless of the income there remains not over $5,000,000 to be distributed in the case of any estate.

Comparison of estate tax under H. R. 8402 and Great Britain is as follows:

Net estate before exemption	H. R. 8402	Great Britain
$2,500	None	$25
$5,000	None	100
$25,000	None	750
$50,000	None	2,000
$100,000	$9,600	8,000
$150,000	17,600	15,000
$200,000	26,600	24,000
$300,000	44,600	48,000
$400,000	62,600	72,000
$500,000	82,600	95,000
$600,000	102,600	120,000
$800,000	150,600	192,000
$1,000,000	206,600	240,000
$2,000,000	546,600	600,000
$5,000,000	2,026,600	1,900,000
$10,000,000	5,726,600	4,500,000

WHY THESE AMENDMENTS SHOULD BE ADOPTED

I recommend for consideration of this committee the rate schedules which I have proposed in the foregoing bills. I believe that these rates are necessary to carry out the purpose stated in the President's recent message dealing with the subject of taxation.

In regard to our policy of taxation, the President says:

> Our revenue laws have operated in many ways to the unfair advantage of the few, and they have done little to prevent an unjust concentration of wealth and economic power.

In further recognition that taxes should be levied in proportion to ability to pay, the President says:

> Taxation according to income is the most effective instrument yet devised to obtain just contribution from those best able to bear it and to avoid placing onerous burdens upon the mass of our people.

And further recognizing the justness of the movement toward progressive taxation of wealth and income, the President says:

> Wealth in the modern world does not come merely from individual effort; it results from a combination of individual effort and of the manifold uses to which the community puts that effort.

The individual does not create the product of his industry with his own hands; he utilizes the many processes and forces of mass production to meet the demands of a national and international market.

Therefore, in spite of the great importance in our national life of the efforts and ingenuity of unusual individuals, the people in the mass have inevitably helped to make large fortunes possible. Without mass cooperation great accumulations of wealth would be impossible save by unhealthy speculation. As Andrew Carnegie put it, "Where wealth accrues honorably, the people are always silent partners." Whether it be wealth achieved through the cooperation of the entire community or riches gained by speculation, in either case the ownership of such wealth or riches represents a great public interest and a great ability to pay.

In line with the thought expressed in these quotations, I have fixed the limit which anyone should leave as $5,000,000. I believe that this country would be better off with a great many persons of small wealth rather than a less number of very great wealth. France and England are examples today of countries in which there are very few men of extremely great wealth. As a matter of fact, I do not understand that any individual in either of these countries possess anything like the wealth of the Ford family or the Mellon family. The recovery which each of these countries made after the war shows on how stable a basis their social structure rests. If we are to provide opportunities for persons of small means, it is incumbent upon the Government to effectively check the growth of large groups of wealth. This can be effectively done only if rates of income tax, inheritance, and gift taxes are amended which will limit the amount of wealth remaining in the hands of the family at the date of death. I believe that the limit fixed in the bills which I have introduced will do this in an effective way.

GIFT TAXES

I have introduced H. R. 8403 as a companion to H. R. 8402. This bill partially plugs an obvious loophole in the present gift- and estate-tax laws. Under the present law, gifts are taxable at rates 75 percent of rates of similar amounts left by inheritance. The savings in tax which can be effected by means of giving away property prior to death is so large in the case of wealthy taxpayers that a substantial portion of their inheritances will be given away to their children prior to death in order to defeat the inheritance-tax laws. The bill which I have introduced makes the rates on gifts the same as inheritance rates. This will partially discourage the giving away of property merely to defeat the tax. It will not, however, prevent the giving away of property prior to death for that purpose. The tremendous saving which can be effected under the present law is indicated by the following figures. In the case of an estate of $10,000,000, the total estate tax is $3,094,500. If, however, the decedent gives away one-half of the property prior to his death the gift tax on one-half of the property is $848,650; the estate tax on the remaining one-half is $1,149,500, making a total tax of $1,998,150, and the saving to the estate is $1,096,350.

The following data taken from reports of the Bureau of Internal Revenue showing receipts of gift taxes for 1933, 1934, and 1935, by months indicates taxpayers are availing themselves of this loophole to reduce death taxes.

	1933	1934
July	$2,832.87	$15,098.84
August	5,322.34	25,134.33
September	9,091.20	67,142.91
October	11,502.91	13,086.17
November	30,568.78	166,139.01
December	186,103.58	243,031.28
	1934	1935
January	$1,764,987.87	$51,832.79
February	997,601.63	382,132.77
March	7,389,435.04	64,339,757.17
April	694,263.21	3,024,711.09
May	252,558.43	430,271.87

I urge that you substitute higher estate-tax rates such as I have proposed in H. R. 8402 for the additional estate-tax rates imposed by the Revenue Act of 1934. Such a tax in view of decisions of the Supreme Court will reach a large portion of the transfers which are certain to be made in anticipation of an inheritance tax (Milliken v. U. S., 283 U. S. 15).

It is hoped that we are now emerging from the most serious depression in the world's history. Experience teaches us that the wealthy during such depressions acquire large volumes of property at bargain-counter prices. The unhealthy condition by reason of accumulation of wealth in hands of too few persons will be greatly aggravated by reason of the profits realized from the purchase of property during the depression. These profits represent the earnings of the great masses who by reason of their unfortunate condition are unable to hold on to their property until normal times. I believe death taxes should be imposed sufficiently high to return a large portion of such wealth to the Government in order that it may be used to liquidate the obligations of the Government now being created for relieving the distressed people of this country.

PROPOSED AMENDMENTS TO STOP LOOPHOLES

The present gift-tax laws enacted to stop a decided loophole in the Federal estate tax laws only partially stop the gap. Two changes are necessary to close the loophole:

1. Reduce the special exemption of gifts to any one person during any taxable year to $500 instead of $5,000 in the present law. The present law was adopted on amendment offered by ex-Senator David Reed, of Pennsylvania.

2. Increase the gift-tax rates to make them equal in every respect to the estate-tax rates.

It may be argued that the estate- and gift-tax laws should encourage the aged to give away their property before death. With the changes I have proposed there will still remain inducement to give away property before death, for even these rates permit substantial savings if portions of property are distributed before death.

ALL TAX LOOPHOLES SHOULD BE STOPPED

It is well recognized that there are many loopholes in our present tax laws through which evasions the Government is losing hundreds of millions of dollars. In addition to the above-suggested amendments, I submit for the Committee's consideration the following proposed amendments as being sound, wholesome amendments that should be made to our tax laws.

1. Effective for any taxable year ending subsequent to the enactment of this act, the Revenue Act of 1934 is amended by adding a new section as follows:

SEC. 169. TRANSFERS TO EVADE TAXATION. (a) Gifts of husband and wife: Where a husband transfers property by gift to his wife, or vice versa, and the husband and wife are living together, or, if separated, there has been no final settlement of their property rights, then the income derived from such property (and from property substituted therefor) shall be included in computing the net income of the spouse who made the transfer as if such transfer had not been made.

(b) Family trust: (1) Where the husband or wife of the creator of a trust is a beneficiary of the trust and the husband and wife are living together or, if separated, there has been no final settlement of their property rights, or (2) where a child or a parent of the creator of the trust is a beneficiary of the trust and under the laws of descent an interest in the corpus of the trust or in the income accumulated for or distributed to the child or parent, as the case may be, may be vested in the creator of the trust, then that part of the income of the trust accumulated for, or distributable to, the husband or wife or child or parent of the creator of trust shall be included in computing the net income of the creator of the trust.

2. Effective for any taxable year ending subsequent to the enactment of this act, section 22 of the Revenue Act of 1934 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

(g) Undivided profits of corporations: Any portion of the net income of a corporation subject to the tax imposed by section 13 (a) of this act remaining undistributed at the close of its taxable year shall be accounted for by the stockholders of such corporation at the close of its taxable year in proportion to their respective shares. Within 45 days after the close of its taxable year and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, the corporation shall file a return showing the number of shares held by each stockholder and the amount of undivided net income allocable to each share and shall report to each stockholder the amount of undivided net income allocable to each share.

3. Effective for any taxable year ending subsequent to the enactment of this act, the Revenue Act of 1934 is amended by adding a new section as follows:

SEC. 151. Disclosure of income not reported as taxable: Every person subject to the tax imposed by this title shall file with the collector a statement for each taxable year showing (1) all income for the year not reported on the income-tax return for the year, (2) all distributions from corporations received within the year and not reported on the income tax for the year, and (3) all sales and exchanges of property other than property held primarily for sale in the course of a trade or business and other than sales and exchanges reported on the income-tax return for the year. Such statement shall be in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Commissioner and approved by the Secretary, shall be filed on or before the 15th day of the third month following the close of the taxable year, and shall be duly verified under oath.

4. Effective upon the enactment of this act, section 501 (a) of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

(a) For the calendar year 1932 and each calendar year thereafter a tax, computed as provided in section 502, shall be imposed upon the transfer during such calendar year by any individual, resident or nonresident, of property by gift or by bequest, devise, or other testamentary disposition. The terms "gift", "gifts", or "net gifts" as used in this title include gifts inter vivos and testamentary gifts and dispositions.

5. Board of Tax Appeals: The present Board of Tax Appeals was created in order to provide an independent review of the taxpayers' cases before assessment of deficiencies. The Bureau by reason of inadequate personnel and incompetent administration imposed ill considered and unreasonable assessments on taxpayers. Congress sought to stop this by providing an independent review body in the Treasury Department. Unfortunately, however, the members soon surrounded their review by the rules adopted by the equity courts of the District of Columbia. This turned what was intended to be a review body into a highly technical court, before which a taxpayer is forced to employ a specially trained lawyer and provide himself with expensive witnesses in order to be given the consideration which was intended without this great expense. In looking over the results of this body I find their rulings are so inconsistent that Bureau officials cannot be consistent in administration because of these inconsistencies. These decisions have laid the groundwork and have been the cause of a flood of litigation equaled in no other country. Administration of our taxing laws is a practical matter. The courts have held that these statutes should be construed liberally in favor of the taxpayer. I see no reason why an administrative problem of arriving at the correct tax should be turned into such a mass of litigation as has resulted from the creation of the Board.

I therefore recommend that you give consideration to abolishing this body. In its stead you should create an independent review body composed not of lawyers only, but of practical tax men such as auditors and engineers. Provide that this body shall function purely as a review body and without the technical requirements of a court. Provision could be made for taking testimony when a case was appealed so that the Board's findings will be given the same status as the findings of Commissioners of the Court of Claims.

The creation of such a body I regard as the first step in simplification and one of the most important ones. I therefore urge its consideration. The following amendment gives effect to my views on this subject.

Tax Adjustment Board: (a) There is hereby created in the Department of Treasury a board to be known as the "Tax Adjustment Board" (hereinafter referred to as the "Board"). The Board shall be composed of nine members. Each member shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 6 years, and shall receive compensation at the rate of $9,000 per annum. The Board shall at least annually designate a member to act as chairman. The Board shall have the powers, duties, and functions described in this section and in section 6 and shall have the power to prescribe rules and regulations governing all appeals filed with it.

(b) Upon receipt of a notice of deficiency in income tax, estate tax, inheritance tax, or gift tax sent to the taxpayer in the manner provided by the Revenue Act of 1924 and subsequent acts, the taxpayer may, within 90 days, or within 90 days after the enactment of this act, whichever is the latest, file a notice of appeal with the Board. Such notice shall be in the form prescribed by the rules of the Board. Within the time provided by the rules of the Board, the taxpayer shall file a statement of all facts and reasons and such documents and papers, or verified copies thereof, which he intends to submit in support of the appeal, and shall, by registered mail, send to the Commissioner a copy of all such statements, reasons, documents, and papers. Thereafter the Commissioner, if he desires to proceed further, shall file with the Board a copy of the income-tax return, a statement of the facts, and reasons and documents relied upon by him and shall send a copy thereof to the taxpayer by registered mail.

(c) The Board shall have the function, power, and duty to hear such appeal and to review, adjust, and determine the tax liability in controversy. All proceedings before the Board shall be in accordance with rules prescribed by it: Provided, however, That all hearings shall be open to the public and all records, documents, and papers filed in any proceeding shall be open to public inspection.

(d) The Board shall notify the taxpayer of its decision by registered mail and send a copy thereof to the Commissioner. If dissatisfied with such decision, the taxpayer or the Commissioner may, within 60 days, file with the Board a notice of dissatisfaction. Such notice shall be in the form prescribed by the Board.

(e) Within 60 days from the filing of the notice of dissatisfaction, the Board shall transmit to the clerk of the United States District Court for the district in which it is located the collector's office to which was made the return of the tax in controversy, typewritten copies of the notice of dissatisfaction and of all statements, documents, and papers on file before the Board and relative to the notice of dissatisfaction. The matter shall thereupon be deemed to be an action in the said court ready for trial or hearing: Provided, however, That should it be deemed advisable by the court or a judge thereof that pleadings be filed, an order may issue directing the parties to file pleadings.

(f) A taxpayer who files a notice of dissatisfaction shall give bond, in a sum fixed by the Board not exceeding double the deficiency determined by the Board, and shall give security for the costs of the appeal to the district. Failure to file such bond and give such security shall render the notice of dissatisfaction and all proceedings thereunder null and void.

6. Board of Tax Appeals abolished: Effective upon the ninetieth day following the enactment of this act, the Board of Tax Appeals established by section 900 of the Revenue Act of 1924 and section 1000 of the Revenue Act of 1926 is hereby abolished. No petition shall be filed with the Board of Tax Appeals with respect to any deficiency determined subsequent to the enactment of this act. All proceedings pending before such Board on the sixtieth day following the enactment of this act are hereby transferred to the Tax Adjustment Board and all the powers, duties, and functions of the Board of Tax Appeals are hereby transferred to the Tax Adjustment Board for the disposition of such pending proceedings. After the Tax Adjustment Board has entered its decision in such pending proceedings, petitions for review may be filed in accordance with sections 1001, 1002, 1003, 1004, and 1005 of the Revenue Act of 1926. The provisions of this section shall not affect any proceeding pending before any appellate court reviewing the action of the Board of Tax Appeals.

In conclusion let me say that I hope the Ways and Means Committee will give careful consideration to the above-suggested bills and proposed amendments when they begin the consideration of writing the new tax bill of 1935.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address delivered by Mr. Bruce Bliven, editor of the New Republic, at the New Jersey Law School.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LAMBETH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a radio address I delivered yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, I am talking to you today on behalf of 2,175,559 old people of the United States who are over 65 years of age, or so many of them as are now entitled to relief under the old-age pension portion of the social security bill recently considered in Congress.

According to the 1930 census, there were 6,633,805 persons in the United States over 65 years old. Of this number, 2,175,559 now reside in States which would not participate in the benefits of the old-age pension plan as passed by the House of Representatives. This does not mean that all of these people above the age of 65 years would receive an old-age pension but only that portion of the figure who would be able to bring themselves within the regulations prescribed by the social security board.

The social security bill has been passed by both the House and the Senate and is almost certain of receiving the signature of President Roosevelt when it is finally sent to him. Therefore it is no longer a political topic worthy of everyday discussion by the political commentators who seek to keep their fingers upon the hot spots in Washington.

My purpose for addressing you today is to call to the attention of my listeners the thing that is holding up the final enactment of this long-delayed and much-needed legislation.

When the bill was up for consideration in the Senate there was adopted an amendment known as the "Russell amendment", which provided that Federal pensions should be paid for 2 years in all States, to those people 65 year of age or older, whether the State had a pension system to match the Federal allocation or not. As you know, the bill as it passed the House of Representatives provided that only those States which had enacted legislation permitting them to pay a State or county old-age pension, would be permitted to receive any of the funds appropriated for that purpose by the Federal Government. Under this bill, as passed by the lower House, only 30 States of the Union would participate in the expenditure of these Federal funds, while 18 States and the District of Columbia would receive nothing. The Russell amendment is a very vital amendment, and unless it is retained in the bill by the conferees of the House and the Senate, who now have the measure up for consideration, I strongly favor a battle on the floor of the House of Representatives to refuse to accept the conferees' report, and favor carrying on such battle until such time as a bill could be passed which would contain therein the Russell amendment, or some other provision which would have the same effect. I have discussed this matter with enough of my colleagues in the lower House to determine that such a floor battle is almost certain if the Russell amendment is not retained.

When the social-security bill was up for consideration in the House just before the vote on final passage, I attempted to have adopted an amendment to provide that the Federal Government should pay its $15 a month in pensions to the old folks in all States. This was the same as the Russell amendment, except that the Russell amendment places a 2-year limitation upon such payments. But the House Members, under the domination of a well-oiled steam roller, refused to adopt my amendment. Therefore, I am sincerely happy that Senator RUSSELL had better luck in the Senate than I did in the House, and I want here to pay tribute to him as a tireless fighter in this battle for justice for all of the old people, without regard to their residence. And, surely, after calm deliberation you cannot help but agree that a person's residence should not be the gage as to whether or not he or she were entitled to receive any benefits flowing from the Federal Government.

My reason for saying this seems to me fundamental, for when the Federal Government is gathering taxes with which to pay the expense of government, State lines and geographical limitations do not enter into the consideration, but all States and peoples of all States pay Federal taxes exactly alike. Therefore, when the benefits of government, which after all come from the collection of Federal taxes, are to be passed back to the people, they should be passed back upon the same basis that the taxes were collected originally. That is, a man in Oklahoma should be entitled to equal benefit from the Federal Government as a man would receive in New York, California, or Maine.

Unless the Russell amendment is retained, the old folks of 18 States and the District of Columbia will not be eligible for Federal old-age pensions until additional legislation is passed. A bill providing for the District of Columbia system is now pending and has a good chance of passage at this session. But all State legislatures have already adjourned and gone home. Therefore, there is no chance that they can enact old-age-pension legislation for several months, and it is likely that this will be delayed for several years in many States, for many States, like Oklahoma, must first amend their State constitution before their legislatures would have authority to enact old-age-pension legislation. The Congress is to blame in part for this condition, for the legislatures had to quit and go home. They could not continue in session as long as we have, and they could not know what kind of laws to pass until we had set the pattern for them with the Federal social security bill.

I have studied the question of old-age pensions for years, and have yet to hear one logical argument as to why the Federal Government does not owe an old-age pension to the man or woman over 65 years in my home State of Oklahoma, which has no State pension system, the same as it does a man or woman over 65 in Arkansas, right across the line, which has just recently enacted its State system. The old man or the old woman is not responsible for the action, or lack of action, of his State in this respect, although he is just as much entitled to help. He suffers as much from hunger; he is just as cold when he is naked as is a person living in a State who has enacted old-age pensions. I think that when the Federal Government admits that it owes an obligation to the old people of the United States, that it owes that obligation to them all alike, irrespective of State rights. But the Russell amendment gets much closer to the thought of the present administration, because it concedes that the obligation to care for the old folks is primarily upon the States, and it simply gives the 18 States which have no pension system 2 years to enact them. Surely no one can object to this with reason.

Some States, as I know Oklahoma is, are now hard hit financially. The sentiment in Oklahoma is overwhelmingly in favor of an old-age pension, but those who attempt to devise plans for a State system are generally stumped when it comes to raising the needed revenue. Therefore I think since Uncle Sam has already admitted, by the action of the President and the Congress, the obligation, that the least he could now do is to give Oklahoma and States like her 2 years to work out the financial and other problems confronting them. And remember, that if Uncle Sam does not pay this money out in the form of old-age pensions, he is going to have to care for a large portion of these old folks, anyway, through relief funds. How much better it would be to give to the old folks what is justly due them for their part in creating out of the wilderness a great nation, and building her to our present enviable position among all the nations of the world, to give to them gladly and in the spirit of loving kindness rather than to dole it out to them in such a miserly fashion that it will further embitter their hearts.

We in Oklahoma feel especially keen about this proposition, because practically all of our old folks were born and raised in other States. Oklahoma was admitted to the Union only 28 years ago. Most of those in Oklahoma eligible for this pension were restless pioneers and builders by nature. They helped create Tennessee, Missouri, and California. They fought with the patriots of Texas. They grew up in Arkansas, Kentucky, and Virginia. In fact, they came to Oklahoma from everywhere. Therefore I have no hesitancy in asking my colleagues, and in asking you from every State in the Union, to help Oklahoma and her other 17 sister States in this proposition.

One of the arguments against the Russell amendment is that it would be too expensive on the Federal Government. Of course, the expense would be no greater under this amendment than it would be if all of the 48 States adopted legislation to bring them within the provisions of the bill as passed by the House of Representatives. But this argument is not sound, because while the census of 1930 showed that there were in the United States 6,633,805 people over 65 years of age, a recent survey by the Committee on Economic Security indicated that there were only 736,342 persons over 65 years of age on the relief rolls in the United States. Knowing how strict and stringent the regulations will be before a person can receive any money appropriated under the Federal social security bill, I am constrained to the opinion that probably the figure of 736,342 persons would not be far amis from the number of persons who would actually receive these benefits, and using this figure as a basis, it would cost the Government $11,044,130 per month, or $132,529,500 a year, to pay the bill under the Russell amendment, or about the cost of three battleships.

The States which do not now have an old-age pension system are: Alabama, Connecticut, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Kansas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Missouri, New Mexico, North Carolina, Oklahoma, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Vermont, and Virginia. If you live in one of these States or in the District of Columbia, you have a vital interest in seeing the Russell amendment retained in the bill.

The way you can best serve the old people of these States is to now wire or write to your Congressman or your Senator and insist that they support the Russell amendment. Join us in this fight to do something for the old people of the United States, who are now going down the shady side of life, which will show them that the United States is a nation grateful to them for the service which they have rendered in building her to our present economic and social standing.

I thank you.

RELIGION AND EDUCATION IN MEXICO

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include some short excerpts from newspaper dispatches.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, a dispatch from Mexico reported recently in the Boston Christian Science Monitor indicates that the students of the University of Mexico will not, voluntarily at least, acquiesce to the program of the Mexican Government to socialize education of school children and college students.

STUDENTS' OPPOSITION TO CALLES INTRODUCED SURPRISE ELEMENT IN MEXICO'S LATEST DISPUTE

By Monitor Correspondent of Latin American News

Mexico's latest political controversy does not surprise persons who have been watching the Government's methods of putting through a 6-year plan. This program for governmental regulation of the economic and social life in the nation hit a snag some time ago. Its platform installing socialistic education in the schools was bitterly opposed by the students of the Universiity of Mexico (now the Natural Autonomous University) and by an organization known as the "National Parents Union."

To make certain the carrying on of the plan the Government has been forced to resort to pressure, and the recent agitation by university students was not the first staged in the capital city. What, however, could have caused surprise, unless observers are hardened to the ways of soldiers and police, was the student demonstration against former President Plutarco Elias Calles. The program being established by the Government is admittedly halfway between the purposes of the present administration at Washington and the chosen few governing the destinies of Russia.

DOMOCRACY v. BOLSHEVISM

Any charge, therefore, by the Mexican President that the recent ousting of his cabinet members, chosen by General Calles, was a move to establish an issue between democracy and fascism seems ridiculous. Democracy, as the term is understood and accepted in the United States (and perhaps the world over), does not include the doctrines of bolshevism.

When the 6-year plan was initiated the Government, as I recall, frankly admitted bolshevistic leanings. Calles, the "iron man" of Mexico, is concerned in the welfare of the middle class, particularly the Indians, and has held rather much to the views of business interests. This makes the student agitation against him most puzzling unless the group of several hundred calling for his banishment represented the extreme left wing.

Reports of this nature emanating from reliable sources in Mexico present convincing evidence of the fact that the present regime in Mexico is unquestionably bent upon the establishment of a communistic state in that country. In the light of the present-day insidious activities of radical forces in our own country to influence and subvert our educational sources—especially in institutions of higher learning—the knowledge that the actual installation of the system of socialistic teaching is being undertaken in Mexico is most alarming. Coupled with the socialization of education in Mexico has been the denial of all avenues of religious training to the child. Priests, ministers, and rabbis have been forbidden to conduct religious services and impart spiritual education of any sort to the youth of Mexico. To enforce this drastic proscription, persecution and severe oppression have been exercised. These activities are not directed solely toward members of the Catholic faith but toward all religion.

As an instance of the tyrannical attitude of the Mexican Government toward education it should be noted that the schools belonging to the members of the Mennonite colonies in the State of Chihuahua were closed because of their refusal to accept the Government's plan of socialistic education. There is a special significance in this action because of the fact that the Mennonites came to Mexico and to the State of Chihuahua under the terms of an express contractual agreement which guaranteed them the right of freedom of religion. Here is a definite contractual obligation of the Mexican Government that has been violated. In order to forestall the conventional Mexican quibble wherever religion and education are concerned, let me point out that these 11 schools belonging to the Mennonites were padlocked by an express order of the federal director of education. The Governor of the State of Chihuahua, however, executed the order. Prominent personages among the Mennonites lodged a public complaint with the Mexican Government, calling attention to the contract they had on this point and urging that they be permitted to reopen their schools.

The Mormons who immigrated to Mexico recently had a similar experience in the matter of education. Their temples in Chihuahua were closed some months ago. On the 19th of May 1935 the Government also closed the Mormon schools. Two charges were lodged against the Mormons—first, that some of their teaching was undertaken in English; and, secondly, that they had neglected the socialistic content of various educational courses. Permission to reopen these schools can be obtained only by promising to undertake the so-called "reforms" dictated by the Mexican Government—namely, by the promise to inaugurate courses of teaching the tenets of socialism and communism.

In order to illustrate that even American children are suffering as a result of this heartless policy of educational persecution, I submit the following affidavit by Alberto Andrade, a resident of Brownsville, Tex. From this sworn statement it is clear that the schools which American children were attending were obliged to inaugurate a system of atheistic and socialistic education.

AFFIDAVIT

STATE OF TEXAS,
County of Cameron, ss:

I, Alberto Andrade, a resident of Brownsville, Tex., and formerly of Monterrey, N. L., Mexico, make the following statement of my own volition, and without compulsion or duress.

For 18 months I was a teacher in the Franco-Mexican College for Boys in Monterrey. This school was attended by approximately 30 American children, sons of American citizens resident in Mexico, as this school was recognized for its high standards in the entire State of Nuevo Leon. There were also children of citizens of France, Germany, Italy, Spain, and Austria.

The children of the consuls of several countries were in continuous attendance.

In February 1935, notwithstanding the high standards and the desire of American and other foreign residents in Mexico to give their children the type of education they preferred, our teachers were ordered to sign the atheistic socialist oath or close their school. I could not betray the trust which those parents had put in my hands, and therefore I was forced to flee from Mexico and see the school closed.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand this 2d day of July 1935, at Brownsville, Tex.

ALBERTO ANDRADE.

Acknowledgment

Before me the undersigned authority, at Brownsville, Tex., this 2d day of July, A. D. 1935, personally appeared Alberto Andrade, known to me to be the person making this affidavit, who declares he makes it voluntarily, and that the statements therein are true, to the best of his knowledge and belief.

[SEAL] C. VILLARREAL,
Notary Public in and for Cameron County.

These are but a few of the countless instances which indicate the firm determination of the present regime in Mexico to force upon the people of that country the doctrines of communism and atheism.

It will be observed that those who would impregnate the minds of children with these doctrines leave no choice to the intellect of the child to accept or reject them but—by cruelty, persecution, coercion, and oppression—actually force their doctrines upon the youth. Not content with the denial of the ordinary guaranties of human liberty in the accomplishment of their purpose, they seek to mold in their own image the minds of coming generations, and in pursuance of their purpose deny them access to all sources of spiritual knowledge and inspiration.

The denial of freedom of speech and freedom of religion, the forceful suppression of all liberty of thought, mind, or action, these are the characteristic and inevitable resources of those who seek to establish the communistic system of government.

It is, however, rather singular that those proponents of the doctrine of the dictatorship of the proletariat in our own country and the forceful overthrow of organized government should invoke the guaranties of our own democratic form of government, which provides for freedom of speech, the press, and religion, whenever there is any effort by our Government to control or counteract their subversive plotting and planning. Yet, every instance in which those forces have gained control of governments, they have resorted to iron-shod tyranny, persecution, suppression, and oppression in order to stamp out every vestige of freedom and of individualism. It is a cardinal tenet of their doctrine that, once their power is established, an absolute dictatorship of the proletariat (which in every instance has meant a chosen few) must prevail until steps have been taken to eradicate every trace of the former order and passive acquiescence to their own order has been forcefully impressed upon the people. To achieve that purpose, they recognize no means as too inhuman and no action as too cruel and brutal.

Such a stage now exists in Mexico. It seems unnecessary for me to dwell at any length upon the shocking brutalities which have existed in Mexico. They are all too commonly known and do not require further discussion by me. I recently received from the order of the Knights of Columbus, who have so stanchly championed the cause of those persecuted and oppressed persons of all religious denominations, a resolution which I wish to quote in part.

Thousands of peaceable and defenseless men, women, and children of that country (Mexico) are deprived of their civil and personal liberties, are subjected daily to most distressing indignities and persecutions, are expatriated and murdered because of their religious beliefs. * * * American citizens have been murdered, their properties have been confiscated, and they have been ruthlessly interfered with in the possession of their property and in the enjoyment of their personal rights. They are driven to accept an educational system for their children that compels the teaching of atheistic and red communism. * * * The Mexican Government now in power, with the avowed and open hostility to our form of government, our free institutions, and our principles of civil and religious liberty, which it works steadily to destroy, directs aggressively a continuous propaganda throughout the United States to promote its soviet philosophy of government through its agent, by means of the radio, and by the use of our Postal Department, which distributes free its printed matter.

The sensibilities of Americans throughout the length and breadth of this Nation have been revolted by the shocking brutalities which have been practiced in Mexico against those innocents who have sought to render suitable worship to their God. But even were there any who were deaf to the pleadings and blind to the sufferings of those afflicted ones in Mexico, surely they must at least be alarmed at the threat which is presented to our own organized Government by the presence at our very borders of a government committed to principles which are diametrically opposed to our own. They cannot view with equanimity the vast organized campaign of propaganda being carried on to our own soil via radio, secret agents, and by means of our own mails, which carries free official Mexican literature.

Some days ago hope was held out to us that the Mexican Government would moderate its educational and religious policy of persecution and that an amnesty was to be granted to persons in Mexico and private schools allowed to reopen. Yet an International News Service dispatch, dated July 2, from Mexico City, quotes President Cardenas as stating that the amnesty decree permitting the return of high prelates and others is being held up and that he approved continued enforcement of the program of socialistic education.

With the dissipation of this hope, I feel that it is now time for us to take some definite action in this matter. Others of my colleagues have spoken on this subject, and it would appear repetition for me to go into precedents for our taking action in this connection. Suffice it to say that information on this subject is incorporated into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and may there be found by any who may desire to obtain it.

I have a communication which cites precedents from 1840 to 1933 which I shall append to my remarks. In view of those precedents there can be no doubt that there is ample justification and reason for our taking some definite diplomatic action to bring relief, at least to our own American citizens in Mexico.

I have recently introduced a resolution in this House—House Resolution 286—which favors the use of the good offices of the United States Government through the United States Department of State and the American Embassy and consular offices in Mexico, with a view to the reestablishment of places of religious worship for American citizens of all denominations resident in or visiting the Republic of Mexico and the unrestricted exercise of their religious beliefs by them. I wish to commend to this House that some action along these lines be taken at once.

In 1840 John Forsyth, Secretary of State, wrote to the American consul in Damascus with regard to the persecution of Jews in that country.

In 1850 President Fillmore refused to sign a treaty with Switzerland until provisions which discriminated against Jews had been omitted.

In 1853 the United States intervened for the protection of Christian missionaires in Greece.

In 1857 Secretary of State Lewis Cass approved of the action of the Minister to The Two Sicilies in protesting the conviction and execution of a Jew for blasphemy.

In 1870 Secretary of State Fish interceded on behalf of Christian missionaires in Hawaii.

In 1870 President Grant appointed Benjamin F. Peixotto, an American Hebrew, as consul to Rumania, for the purpose of promoting Jewish emancipation and the cessation of anti-Jewish activities in that country.

In 1870 the United States remonstrated with Japan against the persecution and banishment of native Christians.

In 1876 Secretary of State Fish directed the United States Chargé d'Affaires to act in concert with the representatives of other governments in protesting against the denial of religious rights to Protestants by the Constitution of Spain.

In 1878 Secretary of State Evans intervened in behalf of the persecuted Jews in Morocco.

In 1882 Secretary of State Frelinghuysen protested against the discrimination by the Russian Government against the American Bible Society.

In 1885 President Cleveland refused to name another Ambassador to Austro-Hungary when that Government refused to receive the Ambassador who had first been named, because he was married to a Jewess.

In 1891 President Harrison expressed to the Government of Russia serious concern because of the anti-Semitic laws and practices of that Government.

In 1893 the United States interceded for the protection of Christian missionaries in Turkish Kurdistan.

In 1895 the U. S. S. Marblehead was sent to the Gulf of Alexandretta as a protest against the threatened massacre of Christians under Turkish rule.

In 1896 the United States interceded on behalf of American religious minorities in the Society Islands.

In 1902 Secretary of State Hay asserted that the right of remonstrance against the treatment of Jews by the Rumanian Government was clearly established and he said:

"This Government cannot be a tacit party to such international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Rumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself but in the name of humanity."

In 1903 President Theodore Roosevelt directed the American Chargé d'Affaires at St. Petersburg to make representations to the Russian Government concerning the massacre of Jews in Russia.

In 1911 the United States terminated a treaty with Russia that had been in effect 79 years because that Government had refused to honor passports to American citizens on account of their race and religion.

In 1915 the United States granted recognition of the Carranza Government in Mexico, upon condition that it would respect every person's right to life, property, and religious beliefs, and in 1921 it submitted to the Government of Mexico a proposed treaty in which it was provided that the nationals of either party were not to be disturbed, molested, or annoyed in any manner on account of their religious beliefs, nor in the exercise of their respective creeds, whether in their homes or in their churches or chapels.

In 1916 the United States Senate adopted a resolution offered by Senator PITTMAN, expressing the hope that the British Government would exercise clemency in the treatment of Irish political prisoners.

In 1919 the United States Government insisted upon inserting in the Treaty of St. Germain stipulations guaranteeing the rights of religious minorities.

In 1919 the Senate adopted a resolution offered by Senator BORAH, with an amendment by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts, requesting the American Peace Commission to endeavor to secure for Edward De Valera, Arthur Griffiths, and Count Plunkett a hearing before the Peace Conference in order that they might present the cause of Ireland, and expressing the sympathy of the Senate with the aspirations of the Irish people for a government of their own choice.

Also in 1919 the United States Senate adopted a resolution requesting the State Department to transmit to the Senate information concerning the massacre of Jews in the Ukraine.

In November 1933 Your Excellency wrote to Mr. Litvinoff, representative of the Russian Government, expressing your concern that Americans residing within the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialistic Republics should enjoy freedom of conscience and religious liberty, and stated that you would expect that they be given the right to have their spiritual needs administered by clergymen, priests, rabbis, or other ecclesiastical functionaries, and that the latter will not be denied entry into the territory of the Soviet Union because of their ecclesiastical status.

In June 1933 protests against the persecution of the Jews in Germany were expressed in speeches on the floor of the United States Senate by Senator ROBINSON, of Arkansas; Senator METCALF, of Rhode Island; Senator COPELAND, of New York; Senator WALSH, of Massachusetts; Senator HATFIELD, of West Virginia; Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland; Senator LEWIS, of Illinois; and Senator WAGNER, of New York.

T. V. A. AND BINDWEED CONTROL

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the T. V. A.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCKEY. Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the course of the debate on section 4 of this bill (H. R. 8632) a number of remarks were made which quite unintentionally impugned the self-reliance and the industry of the farmers not only of my own State but of the entire Midwest. I want to correct those false impressions and at the same time show clearly why those of us from the Middle States vainly attempted to keep in the T. V. A. bill the provisions for the experimentation in the production of chemicals which would destroy noxious weeds. This refers specifically to the bindweed.

During the last 2 years the growth of the bindweed, or wild morning glory, has come to be a menace to much of our richest farmland. Contrary to the belief of my colleagues—the distinguished Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, Mr. McSWAIN, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON—our farmers are entirely willing to fight their own battle against this weed pest. No more industrious or more intelligent group of farmers can be found than those in Nebraska and the surrounding States. These farmers want to exterminate this weed menace, and they know that to do so they need sodium chlorate. The present price of sodium chlorate at Lincoln, Nebr., varies from 8 to 9 cents per pound, and this high price makes it impossible for farmers to use this chemical salt for weed extermination. Our people are smart enough to know that this price is unreasonable and that Government production of this salt in foreign countries has made it possible for farmers here to use it. Our farmers have every right to ask that their Government determine whether or not sodium chlorate can be produced at a price sufficiently low to enable them to buy it for weed eradication. Experimentation as to means of killing bindweed is not urgently needed—we have the information; but the experimentation on means of manufacturing this chemical at a low cost is needed. The Department of Agriculture, with its great technical staff, is hardly a producing agency.

All that we have asked is that the T. V. A. be allowed to determine whether or not sodium chlorate can be produced, either directly or as a byproduct, at low cost. Our farmers will buy it; not beg the Government to give it to them nor send men out to put it on the weeds. At the present time our domestic production of this chemical is insufficient to meet our needs. Here is a chance to produce an article which private enterprise has not been able to manufacture in sufficient quantities to prevent importation from abroad. During the 8-month period ending August 1934, we imported from France and Germany 1,799,840 pounds of this salt. The average export value was 4.2 cents per pound. Added to that value the farmer here must pay the costs of containers, all expenses incident to placing the merchandise into condition ready for shipment to the United States, freight, insurance, tariff, and so forth. The present tariff is 1½ cents per pound.

Sodium chlorate was made for a time in Norway by the Vadheim Elektrokemiske Fabriken A/S. This concern then ceased to produce this salt for a time, and only last year it began to operate again, supplying the local market in Norway and in addition producing some for export. This was a governmental operation that was brought about by a need for cheaper source of supply for agricultural usage. The price of this salt in that country is a little over 1 cent per pound at the plant. The market value of sodium chlorate, domestic, is given by the Oil, Paint, and Drug Reporter of January 7, 1935, as 6¼ to 7½ cents per pound at the works. There are only three manufacturers of this chemical in this country. It is manufactured at Niagara Falls by the Roessler & Hasslacker Department of the E. I. Du Pont de Nemours & Co., the Oldbury Electro Chemical Co., and the American Cyanamid & Chemical Corporation.

That is the present status of our domestic supply and the import market. Sometime ago, after a preliminary investigation showed that sodium chlorate could be produced cheaply at Muscle Shoals, I asked Dr. Harcourt Morgan for information on this subject. His reply to me was, in part, as follows: "We have been compelled to conclude in the light of the provisions of the act that the manufacture of sodium chlorate, as such, by the Corporation was not permissible."

This is no pet hobby. It has nothing to do with cows, chickens, hogs, corn borers, and everything. Our farmers will fight their own battle and we will not be asked to go out and put the salt on the weeds for them. We do not ask for a fancy experimental laboratory to determine just what chemicals will kill weeds. All that we have asked was that the T. V. A. be allowed to make the necessary experimentation that would allow them to determine the cost of manufacture of this salt. The fact that we do not produce a sufficient amount of sodium chlorate in this country and that we have to import this from foreign countries should carry some weight with those gentlemen who in the past few months have been so consistently crying for us to reduce imports of articles which we can produce at home.

DISMISSAL OF EMPLOYEES BY THE COLUMBIAN STEEL TANK CO., OF KANSAS CITY, MO.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and to include therein a letter received by me from Mr. J. N. Davis, assistant president of the Boiler Makers International Union, and also a letter to the President of the United States.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, what are these letters about?

Mr. WOOD. They deal with the controversy between the Columbian Steel Tank Co. and the Boiler Makers Union. Also a letter to the President of the United States on June 5, and another letter from Mr. Davis.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letters:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILER MAKERS,
IRON SHIP BUILDERS, AND HELPERS OF AMERICA,
Kansas City, Kans., June 11, 1935.

Hon. R. T. WOODS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On last evening, the Columbian Steel Tank Co., of Kansas City, Mo., dismissed from its employ two committeemen representing the employees and who were elected as of July 10, 1934, in an election held, supervised, and authorized by the National Labor Relations Board. These men were dismissed for no apparent reason except to intimidate the other employees in the plant and to break down organization which has been established since 1933.

These committeemen have been in the employ of the company for 7 and 19 years respectively. Their work has been of the highest quality and their character is beyond reproach.

We are enclosing a copy of a letter sent to the President of the United States, and we are requesting that this letter be read in the House of Representatives in order that the records of the Government will show the arrogant and unwarranted action taken by this company.

I might also remind you that both of these employees and committeemen have families who are dependent upon them. The 19-year man has quite a large family, and for years worked for 40 cents and 45 cents an hour, but through the organization did succeed in recent months in having increased his wages to 55 cents per hour.

We would appreciate your seeing that this appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Assuring you of our best wishes and kindest regards, I am,
Respectfully,

J. N. DAVIS,
Assistant International President.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILER MAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, WELDERS, AND HELPERS OF AMERICA,
Kansas City, Kans., June 11, 1935.

To His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: May we call to your attention the action of the Columbian Steel Tank Co., of Kansas City, Mo., manufacturers of steel-plate products and who have in the recent past done considerable work for the Government, particularly the building of barges for the Missouri River Barge Line, and who also manufacture considerable products for the farmers, particularly in the Middle West.

The employees of this company started organizing immediately after the passage and enactment of the National Industrial Recovery Act, but have been persecuted and opposed continually by the management.

It was necessary, in July 1934, to hold an election to decide representation in this plant in accordance with the National Recovery Act. As a result of this, the employees elected the International Brotherhood of Boiler Makers as their chosen representative and, at the same time, elected a committee proposed by the same organization and employees to represent them in matters concerning wages and working conditions. While the company has met the committee, not one concession has been made by the company, but they have repeatedly put many obstacles in their way and have done everything possible to discourage the men in their efforts to perfect organization.

The matter that we wish to call to your attention is that on June 10, 1935, the management began dismissing the employees who were elected to the committee at the election held July 10, 1934, by and under the direction of the National Labor Relations Board. We believe that such action warrants the Government giving the widest publicity possible to this, so that the farmers and the petroleum interests and the other industries to which their products are furnished may know of their attitude.

We say this because we have knowledge that both the farmer and the petroleum industry have been hard hit by the action of the United States Supreme Court. Both are now like a ship at sea without a rudder.

The committeemen who have been dismissed from this company have given long and faithful service and their work regarded as being among the best in the plant. Both have served as subforemen and acted as foremen during the absence of the foremen from their department. One has been in the service of the company for 7 years and one has been in service for more than 19 years.

We believe that such cases as this, if called to the attention of the public and given publicity, would create a public feeling and resentment against those employers who attempt to destroy the effectiveness of the act and the good it has accomplished. For, notwithstanding the decision of the United States Supreme Court, there is an overwhelming sentiment and desire among the greater majority of the employers and industries for the continuation of such a set-up as was provided by the National Recovery Act and the National Recovery Administration.

Respectfully and sincerely,

J. N. DAVIS,
Assistant International President.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILER MAKERS,
IRON SHIP BUILDERS, AND HELPERS OF AMERICA,
Kansas City, Kans., June 11, 1935.

ARBITRARY ACTION OF COLUMBIAN STEEL TANK CO. IN THE DISMISSAL OF COMMITTEEMEN ELECTED AS OF JULY 10, 1934, UNDER SUPERVISION OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

About July 1, 1933, the employees of the Columbian Steel Tank Co. started organization among themselves for their own mutual benefit, as they understood that such right was guaranteed them by the Federal law enacted and known as the National Industrial Recovery Act.

During the latter part of July 1933 a considerable number of employees were dismissed from service, a number of whom were later reinstated by the company after much contention before the Kansas City Regional Labor Board and after the representatives of the company had made the statement that the men were not to work for them again because "their minds were warped."

From then until July 1934 the men continually waged a program to bring about recognition by the company of their organization. After several appeals and several postponements, an election was conducted by the Kansas City Regional Labor Board, under and by the direction of the National Labor Relations Board, to decide representation and for the election of a committee. The union and the committee proposed by them were both elected and certified to by the National Labor Relations Board. It was not, however, until about October 1, 1934, that certification and decision was made by the National Labor Relations Board in the case of the Columbian Steel Tank Co. against their employees and the union.

Conferences were arranged for and begun during the early part of November 1934. These conferences were held from time to time but from 1 to 3 weeks apart, due to the attitude of the company, and such conferences were intended to bring about an understanding with regards to working conditions and wages of the employees and in the plant. Nothing, however, resulted from such conferences because of the general attitude of the management. It is true, however, that during the period of organization and while conferences were being held some wage increases were had by the employees of the company.

During this period of recognition, however, the management did participate in and help establish a company union of its employees. This latter organization never gained very much headway but was only used by the company as a source of agitation and opposition to the accredited and recognized union among its employees. This, as you know, was in direct conflict with the law itself and with the rulings of the National Industrial Relations Board.

During the latter part of May 1935 the United States Supreme Court declared section 3 of the National Industrial Recovery Act unconstitutional. This automatically affected the status of every code in existence under the act.

The management of the Columbian Steel Tank Co. on June 10, 1935, less than 2 weeks after the Supreme Court decision, notified at least two of the committeemen elected in July 1934 that their services were no longer required. One of the committeemen had been in the employ of the company for 7 years and was generally considered as being among the best in his department. He was generally used as assistant foreman and as foreman when the foreman was off from work for any cause whatsoever. The other committeeman had been in the employ of the company for more than 19 years and for many years acted as subforeman. He, too, was elected in July 1934 as committeeman by popular choice from among the employees.

The Columbian Steel Tank Co., therefore, has by this action demonstrated to all interested that they are not inclined to carry on under the general make-up of the Recovery Act all the codes governing thei ndustry of which they are a part. We know that both of these employees have been loyal and conscientious workers, and this is just another case in which an arrogant employer is demonstrating the need of some national legislation to insure the workingmen of the country that they to have some right in deciding the question of their right to organize and bargain collectively, through organizations of their own choosing, without interference, coercion, or restraint from the employer or his agent.

It is just such employers as the Columbian Steel Tank Co. who have brought about the conditions that now exist in this great land of ours. Through low wages and long hours the employer has grown rich while the employees have grown poorer and poorer each year, until we find that the employees, the workmen of the country, are unable to buy the necessities of life, and therefore industry after industry found itself without a market or a purchaser of their products.

A continuation of the policies followed by the Columbian Steel Tank Co. would eventually bring about a general uprising among the working people of this country, not because they are so inclined, but because of their realization that it would only be by this method that they could ever hope to obtain and secure for themselves that which rightfully belongs to them in "the land of the free."

The farmers should pay particular attention to the attitude of the Columbian Steel Tank Co. in that they produce many articles that are used by the agricultural group, as such policies as the one adhered to by the Columbian Steel Tank Co. could only lessen the opportunity of the farmer to dispose of his crop.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILER MAKERS,
IRON SHIP BUILDERS, AND HELPERS OF AMERICA,
Kansas City, Kans., July 5, 1935.

Re: Attitude of management Columbian Steel Tank Co., Kansas City, Mo.

Hon. R. T. WOOD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As an addition to our letter of recent date dealing with the attitude of the Columbian Steel Tank Co., of Kansas City, and the dismissal of committeemen elected in an election held July 10, 1934, by the National Industrial Relations Board, and in which we advised you of the dismissal of Mr. Stewart and Mr. Keegan, we are now advising that Mr. R. H. Reed, another committeeman, elected the same date and who has been in the employ of the company for 6 years, was also dismissed without cause.

This is also true of Mr. William J. Mittelstaedt, who has been an employee of the company since January 1919 as a welder, having served as foreman for 8 years. These dismissals occurred June 24, 1935.

The company has also dismissed without cause or reason Mr. Homer Idleman, who has been in their employ for 8½ years, having been employed in 1927 and dismissed June 28, 1935. While Mr. Idleman was not a member of the committee elected, he was one of our most active members in behalf of the union.

It is our desire that this information be handled in the same manner as the previous information, which was that it be made a matter of record with the hope and thought of bringing some action or pressure to bear on this through the new national Wagner Disputes Act.

Assuring you of our best wishes and thanks, I am,

Sincerely and respectfully,

J. N. DAVIS,
Assistant International President.

JND:MC.

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF BOILER MAKERS, IRON SHIP BUILDERS, WELDERS AND HELPERS OF AMERICA,
Kansas City, Kans., July 5, 1935.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

Re: Attitude of management, Columbian Steel Tank Co., Kansas City, Mo.

DEAR SIR: Some few weeks ago we wrote you with reference to the dismissal of two committeemen elected July 10, 1934, in an election at the above company held by the National Industrial Relations Board, such action being taken immediately after the action of the United States Supreme Court with regards to the National Recovery Act.

This company was party to the steel plate fabricating code and the metal-tank code. Since that time the company has dismissed William J. Mittelstaedt, who was employed in January 1919 and dismissed June 21, 1935, and was employed in the capacity of welder and had served as a foreman for 8 years. Mr. Mittelstaedt was also one of the committeemen elected July 10, 1934.

The company has also dismissed Mr. R. H. Reed, who was employed in October 1929 and rated as a welder, and who was elected as committeeman in the election held July 10, 1934. They have also dismissed Mr. Homer Idleman, who has been in the service of the company for 8½ years, being employed in 1929 as a welder, and was dismissed June 28, 1935, and, while Mr. Idleman was not a member of the committee, he was one of our most active members.

There is no question in our minds but what the company is taking every unfair advantage of these men because of their having exercised the rights that they believed belonged to them and which were established under the National Recovery Act.

It is not our desire to bother you with these questions, but we feel that they should be made a record of the Government, as we understand this company from time to time is given contracts by the United States Government, and especially through the Engineering Bureau of the War Department, for barges and tanks and the like. We ask that this be made a record, as was our previous letter on this subject.

Assuring you of our whole-hearted support and cooperation, I am,

Sincerely and respectfully,

J. T. DAVIS,
Assistant International President.

REPRESENTATIVE DRIVER

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, I do this because I want the RECORD at this point to show my personal gratitude to the estimable gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. DRIVER], who has occupied the chair as presiding officer of the Committee of the Whole during the consideration of the T. V. A. bill.

He has done unusually well, in consideration of a highly controversial issue, in maintaining order and decorum and in promoting the public business, and I for one desire to give him my thanks. This body needs presiding officers who insist that order be maintained. [Applause.]

SENATE ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the Senate of the following titles:

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. TYDINGS presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Maryland, praying for the enactment of the bill (S. 916) to carry into effect the decisions of the Court of Claims in favor of claimants in French spoliation cases not heretofore paid, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Independence and Ellis, and of employees of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., of Topeka, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a retirement system for railroad employees, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Council of the City of Niagara Falls, N. Y., opposing the enactment of legislation providing that the dividends on municipal securities shall have the exemption which has been granted to them removed, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions signed by sundry citizens of the State of New York, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

RESOLUTION AND PETITION RELATING TO THE FEDERAL GASOLINE TAX

Whereas the Congress of the United States in 1932 levied an emergency Federal tax of 1 cent per gallon on the sale of gasoline, the revenues from which since have been utilized for general-fund purposes; and

Whereas the Federal gasoline tax constitutes double taxation of motor fuel since the 48 States and the District of Columbia already were taxing gasoline when the Federal levy was imposed, making the Federal tax an invasion of the rights of the States; and

Whereas the cumulative average of gasoline taxes now levied by Federal, State, county, and municipal governments amounted on June 1, 1935, to 5.46 cents per gallon, which is equivalent to a sales tax of more than 40 percent; and

Whereas contrary to the intent, purpose, and principle of gasoline taxation as originally conceived and later subscribed to by the Congress of the United States in the Hayden-Cartwright Act of 1934, the Federal gasoline tax encourages diversion and evasion of gasoline-tax revenues in this State; and

Whereas for the foregoing reasons, and in view of the additional fact that the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the Finance Committee of the Senate, and the Vinson Subcommittee on Double Taxation each has previously recognized the unfairness of the Federal gasoline tax and all have recommended that it be eliminated; and

Whereas we believe that any amendments or bills introduced in Congress for the abolition of this tax should be supported, and we earnestly petition that Senators and Representatives from this State vote for such bills or amendments: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the undersigned citizens of the State of New York urge and petition you to use your utmost endeavors to carry out our desires as expressed in the spirit and words of this resolution to the end that all those citizens who operate motor vehicles, or are consumers of gasoline, be afforded relief from this excessive and duplicating tax burden; and be it further

Resolved, That we petition you to present our views to the Ways and Means Committee of the House, the Finance Committee of the Senate, and to Congress generally, to the end that the Federal gasoline tax will be eliminated in accordance with the declared intent at the time it was enacted.

MIXED CLAIMS COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND GERMANY

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 168), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Whereas in response to Senate Resolution No. 181, agreed to on June 8, 1932, a report from the Secretary of State on the character and estimated amount of the claims of American nationals against the Government of Germany filed with the Department of State, between June 30, 1928, and June 8, 1932, disclosed that 2,138 notices of claim had been filed having an estimated value of $5,495,000, exclusive of interest; and

Whereas several hundred additional claims of American nationals against the Government of Germany have been notified to the Department of State since June 8, 1932; and

Whereas in future negotiations with the Government of Germany for the settlement of these claims and for the information of the Congress, it is desirable that a survey be made of the additional claims notified to the Department of State since June 8, 1932, in order that a more accurate estimate may be stated as to the total amount to be claimed of the Government of Germany: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the agent of the United States, before the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, all claims and notices of claims of American nationals against the Government of Germany, under the treaty of Berlin of August 25, 1921, filed in the Department of State between June 8, 1932, and the date of the passage of this resolution.

That the agent of the United States, Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, shall examine all of the claims and notices of claims filed in the agency of the United States and/or in the Department of State by American nationals against the Government of Germany, to determine the character and amount of such claims under the decisions of the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, heretofore rendered under the treaty of Berlin, of August 25, 1921, and the principles of international law applicable thereto.

That the agent of the United States, Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, be, and is hereby, instructed to prepare and transmit within 15 days after the passage of this resolution a report setting forth as nearly as may be ascertained from the documents now on file the character and amount of the additional claims, and notices of claims, of American nationals against the Government of Germany, filed between June 8, 1932, and the date of the passage of this resolution.

RETIREMENT OF ACTING ASSISTANT SURGEONS OF THE NAVY

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 883) directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 64 years, which were, on page 1, line 5, to strike out "64" and insert "70";

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 70 years."

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CUSTODY OF FEDERAL PROCLAMATIONS, ORDERS, ETC.—CONFERENCE REPORT

Mr. BARKLEY submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6323) to provide for the custody of Federal proclamations, orders, regulations, notices, and other documents, and for the prompt and uniform printing and distribution thereof, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, and agree to the same.

ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
KENNETH MCKELLAR,
PETER NORBECK,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
EMANUEL CELLER,
RANDOLPH PERKINS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

STATEMENT BY FRANKLIN W. FORT ON GOLD-CLAUSE BILL

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a very able and informative statement made on July 11, 1935, by Hon. Franklin W. Fort, of New Jersey, before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives, of which body he was for a number of years a distinguished Member. This statement refers to the so-called "gold clause" bill now before the Congress, to withdraw from the citizenry of the United States their right to bring suit against their Government.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

From olden times the right of the sovereign to be immune from suit has been recognized, but as enlightenment and democracy spread government after government found means of making it possible for its citizens to secure their just dues even from the sovereign.

In this country until 1855 claims against the Government were heard and their propriety determined by the Congress, which appropriated or not, as it saw fit, treating each case as it pleased. This led to scandals and abuses and to an enormous burden upon the Members of the Congress in the handling of private bills. So in 1855 Congress itself set up the Court of Claims as the forum in which all suits against the Government of the United States on contracts might be heard and determined. When the Court of Claims finds a judgment against the United States the judgment can be paid only out of moneys appropriated by Congress for that purpose. Twice since the institution of the court Congress has exercised its right of refusing to pay such a judgment.

In March 1935 the Supreme Court of the United States handed down its decision in the so-called "gold-clause cases"; 8 of the 9 justices agreeing that Public Resolution No. 10, of June 5, 1933, was unconstitutional and void, but 5 of the 9 justices agreeing in an opinion that inability of the plaintiff to prove damages barred any recovery against the United States.

On June 27 the President sent a special message to the Congress, pointing out that danger existed, that the Government might be held to answer in heavy damages for its action in refusing to pay in gold its obligations which promised such payment. He therefore urged the Congress to make it impossible for the courts to award any such damages by repealing the laws which now permit any citizen recourse to the courts on the obligations of the Government. On June 28 the chairman of this committee introduced House Joint Resolution 339, which purports to carry out the purposes of the President's message, namely, to prevent the Government being mulcted in heavy damages for its failure to pay gold.

Before proceeding to the discussion of this resolution, Mr. Chairman, I want to make it clear that the respect I personally feel for you, based on our years of association in the House, renders me certain that the language of the resolution is not your choice, but that, as is the practice too often, the resolution has been drawn in the executive branch of the Government and sent here for passage.

I say this because I am certain, Mr. Chairman, that you would not have drawn a resolution basing it in its first preamble entirely on Public Resolution No. 10 of June 5, 1933, which you knew to have been declared unconstitutional and void.

I venture the statement that this is the first time in the history of the Congress of the United States that any piece of legislation has been proposed which so flouted the authority and dignity of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Nor can I believe, Mr. Chairman, that you would have written the second whereas of the preamble, which asserts that "The unmatured security issues of the United States * * * underlie our national monetary system and credit structure, with the result that disparity in these security issues * * * would undermine that system and structure." Disparity between the security issues of the Government exists today in the rate of interest, in the tax-exemption privileges, in the right to offer some but not all in payment of public debts, in the date of maturity. Other forms of disparity cannot undermine our credit structures, if these do not. Rendering our security issues unenforceable—removing the power of the courts even to interpret them—can and will undermine our credit structure.

Nor, Mr. Chairman, can I believe that you are guilty of the fourth paragraph of the preamble, which declares that "any speculative holding of, or dealing in the money or securities of the United States, to take advantage of the Government's fixed policy to continue * * * certain and uniform treatment is incompatible with the public interest."

How can any speculator or dealer make any advantage out of a fixed policy to treat everyone alike?

But I am far more concerned today with the substance of the resolution. I refer to the preamble only because it is a collection of gilded words to disguise a hidden purpose. The purpose of the preamble is to make the American people think that all the resolution does is to prevent suits for punitive damages arising out of the gold-clause obligations. Section 2, however, withdraws from the courts any jurisdiction to hear and determine any controversy arising out of any obligation for the repayment of money, now or hereafter issued, whether payable in gold or currency, or confetti, whether demanding damages or the mere face of the bond. For example, no court could hear a controversy arising under section 1 of this very resolution. The Secretary of the Treasury could interpret it as he pleased.

Section 2 is the first step backward in the history of the United States toward the reassertion of the doctrine that the king can do no wrong. As I have pointed out, the Court of Claims was set up voluntarily by the Congress to afford a forum where any citizen might urge that the administrative branch of the Government had deprived him of his just rights under a contract with the United States. The court has no power to pay any claimant any damages. It does have power to determine the right of the citizen to such a payment under the laws previously adopted by Congress. If it decides that the claim is a just one—that any officer in the administrative branch of the Government has failed to carry out the laws of Congress—then Congress may appropriate or not, as it sees fit, to meet the judgment. If you adopt House Joint Resolution 339 in its present form, you are serving notice to the holders of every obligation of the United States for the repayment of money that you are unwilling that the courts which you have set up shall pass upon the merits of their claims. No forum will then exist where the holder of any such obligation may assert his rights, or his belief as to his rights; may take testimony on any facts material to his claim; or may have any judgment of an impartial tribunal either as to the interpretation of his contract or as to the conduct of any major or minor official of the Government of the United States. The Treasury Department will become the court of last appeal.

Our courts of late have insisted that, under the Constitution, Congress may not delegate authority unduly to the executive branch of the Government. If you pass this resolution you are delegating to the executive branch of the Government an absolute power to interpret the laws of Congress relating to its bonds, without supervision or control, save through impeachment. Remember, gentlemen, that no judgment of the court has to be paid if you feel that the reasoning upon which it is based is faulty or its effect is disastrous to the Nation. Under your powers you can control without this resolution the payment of any damages, just or unjust, awarded against the Government in any suit.

The newspapers last night stated that one of the members of this committee referred to this legislation as "repudiation", and that the Attorney General of the United States replied: "I do not feel that 'repudiation' is the proper word for action of the Government in exercising a solemn right."

What is this solemn right? The only parallel that exists in the law to the right of the sovereign to deny remedy against himself is the right of a man to plead in answer to a claim against him that it is a gambling debt—and no gentleman ever pleads that on an honest claim.

Practically, the passage of this resolution will shake the credit of the United States as surely as we sit in this room today. If you doubt it, look at the credit of those States and municipalities which, whether justly or unjustly, have hidden behind technicalities to escape the jurisdiction of the courts on their bonds. If you doubt it, think how much credit you would extend to a man who deliberately made himself judgment proof and advertised it to the world. If you doubt it, look at the States which have passed moratorium legislation on private debts and see how many lenders seek to extend credit there.

The courts of the United States were set up by the Government, either in the Constitution or by act of Congress, and their powers defined and limited. Their judges are appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. They interpret the laws which the Congress passes and determine whether the executive officers of the Government comply with those laws. Have we reached a point in this country where on any phase of our national life we can no longer trust those instrumentalities of our own selection to do justice between one of us and all of us? Have we reached a point where, in place of the doctrine that every man is equal before the law, we must substitute the rule that the king can do no wrong? If this resolution is passed, apparently we have, for it closes as it began, with a reference to Public Resolution No. 10, of June 5, 1933, which the Court we created for our protection against our Government has declared void.

STATE RIGHTS AND RESPONSIBILITIES AND THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present for printing in the RECORD an address delivered by Hon. Karl A. Crowley, Solicitor of the Post Office Department, before the Texas Bar Association at Houston, Tex., on the evening of July 4, 1935, on the subject "State Rights and Responsibilities and the Federal Constitution."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. President and members of the bar association, few honors can come to any Texas lawyer greater than an opportunity to address his fellow members of this association. I deeply appreciate the opportunity you have given me to discuss with you those great principles upon which the earnest attention of all good citizens has been refocused and reconcentrated by the eventful times in which we live. I am deeply sensible of the fact that these principles could not be discussed before any gathering better equipped to understand, preserve, and put them into practice in Texas than the distinguished lawyers and judges assembled here today. And I hope that the bench and my fellow members of the bar will consider that in discussing great issues involving the very framework of our Government, my temerity is at least counterbalanced by the sincerity with which I speak.

CREATION OF THE FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

This Constitution of ours, which has withstood the vicissitude of actual experience, was not carelessly or hurriedly drawn and accepted by the people of the United States. Many months were consumed in the drafting of the charter and its acceptance by the people of the country.

The Constitution of the United States is not a declaration of political theory. It is an intensely practical document designed for practical purposes by practical men. Those who drafted this charter were men of powerful intellect and strong convictions. These convictions sometimes were hostile to each other, and the document which resulted from their combined labors was, as it should have been, the result of a series of well-considered compromises.

By this Constitution the American people chose the form of government they most desired for themselves. They provided for a dual form of government, by the States for matters arising in and concerning only the respective States and by a Federal Government for matters of national concern.

In those days there was a division of opinion among the greatest thinkers of the young country as to just what form this Government should take—whether the people should have the right of local self-government within the respective States concerning matters that related wholly to such State, or whether the country should be ruled by a strong central government with autocratic powers. Naturally, the fiercest and most important controversy on any political question ever presented to the people of the country arose out of the acceptance of the Constitution, and it was only because the people objected to surrendering to the central Federal Government all of the sovereign powers of their States that the ninth and tenth amendments to the Constitution were adopted, reserving to the people or to the States all powers not delegated to the United States. From that issue there developed the two great political parties that we have today.

Alexander Hamilton, in his debates upon the Constitution at the Convention, proposed that the States should be extinguished outright. Not only did Hamilton recommend that the States should be extinguished, but he urged that "the Government of the Union must be empowered to pass all laws" and "the same must be the case in respect to commerce and to every other matter to which its jurisdiction is permitted to extend"; and again, "the National Government, like every other, must judge in the first instance of the proper exercise of its powers and its constituents in the last."

Jefferson, Madison, and others who thought as they did, while conceding that the Federal Government should be empowered to control all truly national affairs, insisted that State lines be preserved, that the States continue sovereign control of local and internal matters, and finally took their stand upon the proposition that all powers other than those specifically granted to the Federal Government should be reserved to the States and their people.

Thus we see that the issue was clean-cut—whether to have all governmental powers centered in the Federal Government or to continue with the States themselves solving their own local problems. Happily, I think, for our great country, the principles of Jefferson and Madison were accepted and written into the Federal Constitution, providing for the government by the States for State affairs and by the Federal Government for national affairs. Thus was born the doctrine of State rights, the great doctrine bequeathed by Jefferson and Madison to the Democratic Party, which we of the South have always cherished and which we will continue to uphold and protect.

Months passed before the States adopted this Constitution. Its every word and phrase, and every meaning which could possibly be put on every syllable, were debated before conventions, before street crowds, and before the fireplaces of the colonists. The States, when they adopted this Constitution, well knew the form of government for which it provided. Their choice was deliberate and wise, and it should be upheld today.

So clear was the opinion of our people that State rights were recognized and acknowledged by the Constitution that few of them knew, and few probably would have believed, that a vigorous attempt had been made by the Federalists (whose heritage is now claimed by the Republican Party) to destroy those rights, and that the attempt had been repulsed only by the unconquerable courage of Jefferson and Madison and the other political forefathers of the Democratic Party. The proceedings of the Constitutional Convention were not made public until long after the Constitution had been adopted, and the great liberal interpreter of the Constitution, Chief Justice John Marshall, an aggressive Federalist, apparently without knowledge of the true facts, said:

"No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass. * * * In America the powers of sovereignty are divided between the Government of the Union and those of the States. They are each sovereign, with respect to the objects committed to it, and neither sovereign, with respect to the objects committed to the other."

The Democratic Party has ever been, and is now, the champion of State rights as against the attacks of the Republicans. When I see those who claim political descent from Alexander Hamilton, such as the Chairman of the Republican National Committee, a former Republican President, Republican Senators and Members of Congress, and candidates for the Republican nomination for President, rushing into the public places and the public prints to preach the doctrine of State rights, one must be reminded that the devil himself can quote scripture for his own purpose. Seeking to distort history for the sake of political expediency they make the amazing claim that in order to prove yourself an advocate of State rights it is necessary to vote the Republican ticket.

It has been my experience to observe that some of these gentlemen, who are now the loudest in their denunciation of the present administration, are so versatile that they will take either side or both sides of any issue without a blush in the hope of embarrassing Democrats.

We have all grown so accustomed to the use of the phrase "State rights" that I fear we do not realize its true significance. Under the Constitution, which the people have granted and also accepted, the phrase "State rights" means that there were granted to the Federal Government of the United States only those powers specifically mentioned in the Constitution, or as the Supreme Court said, those powers which are specifically granted or which must follow by necessary implication. All other powers of government are and must remain vested in the States and their people.

James Madison, urging the adoption of the ninth and tenth amendments of the Constitution, said:

"If they are incorporated into the Constitution independent tribunals of justice will consider themselves in a peculiar manner the guardians of those rights; they will be an impenetrable bulwark against every assumption of power in the legislative or executive; they will be naturally led to resist every encroachment upon rights expressly stipulated for in the Constitution by the declaration of rights. Besides this security there is a great probability that such a declaration in the Federal system would be enforced; because the State legislatures will jealously and closely watch the operations of this Government and be able to resist with more effect every assumption of power than any other power on earth can do; and the greatest opponents to a Federal Government admit the State legislatures to be sure guardians of the peoples' liberty. I conclude, from this view of the subject, that * * * we should offer something, in the form I have proposed, to be incorporated in the system of Government as a declaration of the rights of the people."

We are all more or less familiar with the principles of government and of civil rights and liberties as written by Thomas Jefferson into the Declaration of Independence, but it might be well to quote from one of his papers written in 1800 relative to the adoption of the amendments to the Constitution. He said:

"It (the Government) can never be harmonious and solid while so respectable a portion of its citizens support principles which go directly to a change of the Federal Constitution to sink the State governments, consolidate them into one, and to monarchize that. Our country is too large to have all its affairs directed by a single government. * * * I do verily believe that if the principle were to prevail of a common law being in force in the United States * * * it would become the most corrupt government on earth. * * * What an augmentation of the field for jobbing, speculating, plundering, office building, and office hunting would be produced by an assumption of all the State powers into the hands of the General Government. The true theory of our Constitution is surely the wisest and best, that the States are independent as to everything within themselves and united as to everything respecting foreign nations."

The greatest champion of State rights Texas has ever produced, and one of the greatest statesmen who have ever sat in the Senate of the United States, was none other than Joseph Weldon Bailey. His great orations upon the subject have resounded throughout the country, and no truer words were ever spoken than those of Joseph Bailey when he said, on March 9, 1908:

"There are greater misfortunes in this world than poverty and the greatest of all will be the loss of that liberty which can only be perpetuated through the preservation of State rights."

From the days of Jefferson to the present moment an adherence to these principles by the followers of Jefferson has kept and preserved this Nation, and if our republican form of government is to survive, the love of these principles must be forever kept alive in our hearts.

JUDICIAL CONSTRUCTION OF THE CONSTITUTION

The Constitution is a written instrument. With respect to the powers reserved it is not susceptible of any meaning except that plainly written into it. Not only is the fact that State rights were reserved and preserved by the Constitution clear to the student of political history but the courts have consistently affirmed this doctrine. No "construction" of the Constitution negativing the reservation of these rights to the sovereign States will ever be indulged in by conscientious judges. The Constitution sets up a Federal Government composed of sovereign States, and, as the Supreme Court said:

"* * * The sovereign powers vested in the State governments by their respective constitutions remained unaltered and unimpaired, except so far as they were granted to the Government of the United States. That the intention of the framers of the Constitution in this respect might not be misunderstood, this * * * interpretation is expressly declared in the tenth article of the amendments, namely: 'The powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States, respectively, or to the people.' The Government of the United States, therefore, can claim no powers which are not granted to it by the Constitution, and the powers actually granted must be such as are expressly given, or given by necessary implication. The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other within their respective spheres. The former in its appropriate sphere is supreme; but the States, within the limits of their powers not granted, or, in the language of the tenth amendment, 'reserved', are as independent of the General Government as that Government within its sphere is independent of the States."

And again:

"Not only, therefore, can there be no loss of separate and independent autonomy to the States, through their union under the Constitution, but it may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government. The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States."

In holding that a Federal income tax, otherwise constitutional, could not be collected from a State judge, the Supreme Court said:

"The supremacy of the General Government, therefore, * * * in respect to the question before us, cannot be maintained. The two governments are upon an equality. In respect to the reserved powers, the State is as sovereign and independent as the General Government."

The fact being established that this dual system of government was established by a grant of certain powers to Federal officials and the reservation of all other powers to the States and the people, the question is presented as to just how far, in the light of changed and changing conditions, Congress is empowered to go in enacting general laws applicable to the people of the several States. Chief Justice Marshall said:

"That the United States form for many and for important purposes a single nation has not yet been denied. In war we are one people. In making peace we are one people. In all commercial regulations we are one and the same people."

He held that the Constitution recognizes a distinction between that commerce which concerns more than one State and the exclusively internal commerce of the several States. Originally the Supreme Court held that the term "regulate", as applied to commerce, meant the power to govern commerce. In later years the Court went much further and held that the power of Congress under the commerce clause of the Constitution was the power to foster, protect, and promote commerce. The Court has not held—in my opinion it should not and will not hold—that under this law Congress has power to prohibit the free flow of normal commerce between the States upon visionary social considerations. We must remember what Justice Day of the Supreme Court said should never be forgotten. Wisely he stated that:

"In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States to which are entrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved. The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the General Government."

PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT AND STATE RIGHTS

There are those who have charged President Roosevelt with having abandoned the Democratic theory of local self-government. It must be remembered that he is a Democrat from choice; that he grew up in an environment saturated with the Hamiltonian theory of an autocratic central government as opposed to the theory of State rights; but, nevertheless, with courage and freedom and independence of mind which characterize him, he chose to be a Democrat. His past record proves in itself that he is a supporter of our Democratic theory of government and all that it implies. Only a supporter of State rights could say, as he has said:

"The preservation of this home rule by the States is a fundamental necessity if we are to remain a truly united country. * * * To bring about government by oligarchy masquerading as democracy it is fundamentally essential that practically all authority and control be centralized in our National Government; the individual sovereignty of our States must first be destroyed. * * * We are safe from the danger of any such departure from the principles upon which this country was founded just so long as the individual home rule of the States is scrupulously preserved and fought for whenever they seem in danger. Thus it will be seen that this home rule is a most important thing—a most vital thing if we are to continue along the course on which we have progressed with such unprecedented success."

There are those who have said that he has departed from these principles. No person has ever accused President Roosevelt of being insincere or dishonest, and no reasonable man can believe that this champion has overnight changed his views concerning the rights and liberties of the American people.

We must remember that when this administration came into office this country was involved in a deadly crisis far more serious than that of war. Commerce had ceased. The channels of credit were clogged. Millions of people were destitute and becoming desperate through hunger. It cannot be denied that the country was prostrate and that immediate extraordinary remedies must be found in order to preserve this country itself. President Roosevelt did not seize the reins of power. He did not take advantage of the faith that a desperate people had imposed in him and seize the power of a dictator, but he did have the courage to submit to Congress, as provided in our Constitution, plans which he believed would aid in the restoration of economic peace to our citizenship. Recognizing his grave responsibility, he must have been mindful of the words of that great jurist, Justice Holmes, who has just passed on:

"It is not lightly to be assumed that in matters requiring national action, a power which must belong to and somewhere reside in every civilized government is not to be found."

No statement made by President Roosevelt can by any stretch of the imagination be construed to mean that he advocates a change in our democratic form of government. At most, the recent utterances of President Roosevelt can only be construed to mean that he believed that the crisis brought on by the economic depression justified extraordinary powers for a temporary period and that the exercise of the power provided by the National Industrial Recovery Act was, in his opinion, authorized by the commerce clause of the Constitution. Unquestionably, he believes that the Constitution is a living, vital, moving thing; that it should not be so narrowly construed as to prevent Congress from exercising full power to enact legislation within the limitations prescribed by the Constitution, to promote the public welfare and the peace and happiness of all the people guaranteed to them by the Constitution itself. With Woodrow Wilson he believes that:

"We must treat the Constitution as a vehicle of life, and not as a strait-jacket.

"There was a time when the thoughtful eye of the judge rested upon the changes of social circumstances and almost palpably saw the law arise out of human life."

The President can ask no more than that he be judged by his own words and by his own acts. It should be borne in mind, however, that there is a deliberate dishonest design by his vicious political enemies and predatory interests to convince our people that the President plans to set up a dictatorship, to abolish State lines and State governments, and to that end has overridden and violated his oath to defend and support the Constitution. His every statement is distorted and misinterpreted, and the very hopes and plans which he has for the betterment of the people are sought to be utilized in this attempt to destroy his beneficent influence.

The enemies of the President have sought to make capital of the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Schechter case. Especially have they unfairly sought to create the impression among lawyers, who naturally regard this Court with reverence and affection, that there has been in his attitude an element of disrespect. He has recognized, most properly, that the Court had power to render this decision involving the constitutionality of the National Recovery Act. Immediately upon the rendition of the decision he suspended the operation of the codes and ordered the dismissal of all suits involving their enforcement. This entire and respectful compliance with the Court's mandate in this particular case certainly is evidence of his willingness to be bound by decisions of the courts of our country. It is true that the President has indicated that in his opinion the National Industrial Recovery Act was authorized by the commerce clause of the Constitution. To hold this opinion and to express it he has the inalienable right of every American citizen, as you or I have the right to consider and to say that the decision of the Court is most sound. I honor the courage of the President in making sincere statements of his opinion when he knew he would face vicious and unwarranted attacks made upon him as the result. Certainly there can be no deserved censure of the President for expressing his natural disappointment when one of those measures which he, acting under authority delegated to him by Congress, inaugurated for the benefit of the people was held unconstitutional.

The enactment of the National Recovery Act and the action taken thereunder was not an attempt by the President to seize power for himself. It was an attempt by the President himself to be of service to the people. He presented a problem to Congress and carried out the directions of Congress expressed in public laws. While the Supreme Court has held that the law enacted by Congress was unconstitutional, it may not honestly be said that the enactment of this law, or the action of the President taken thereunder, was either usurpation of power or an attack upon State rights. They were neither, but merely the extraordinary measures which the President and Congress alike considered necessary to deal with an extraordinary situation, for the welfare of the American people. While the President's utterances clearly indicate that he does not consider the Constitution a shackle enslaving a progressive people, he has nowhere indicated by act or deed that the Constitution or laws should be used as instruments to establish a bureaucratic centralized government, which upon so many occasions he has forcefully denounced.

Lawyers may differ with the President's construction of the commerce clause of the Constitution. Business men may question the soundness of the economic principles of the codes. But every patriotic American knows that President Roosevelt has been actuated by the highest motive which impels the action of great men—the honest, sincere desire to relieve suffering humanity and to advance the economic welfare of this country.

The present tactics of the President's political enemies are as inconsistent as they are despicable. Why did they not call it despotism when he saved every solvent bank in the United States? There was no talk of tyranny and oppression when the Government saved big business from destruction. Then why should it be called tyranny and oppression for the President and Congress to undertake to save small business from similar destruction?

Was it considered an act of dictatorship when by the President's authority hundreds of millions of dollars were poured into the railroads to save them from ruin? Was it considered usurpation of power when the President provided means to save great insurance corporations from bankruptcy? Was it considered an attack upon State rights to provide ways and means for saving the great mortgage companies from destruction? These statements are not the statements of honest men, but the outward evidence of a deliberate attempt by partisan politicians to undermine the trust of the American people, which the President has so richly merited. America should be thankful, however, that honest business has the greatest confidence in the wisdom of the President, as well as in his sincerity and courage.

It will take a lot more than a "dead grass" convention composed of reactionary leaders of a dead Republican Party to dislodge the confidence now reposed by the people in Franklin D. Roosevelt.

AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION

I well and thoroughly understand the apprehension with which so many view the possibility of any change in the Federal Constitution. Those of my political faith have always feared changes in this document because proposed changes have usually involved an attack upon the sovereignty of the States. Yet 21 amendments to the Constitution have been adopted by the will of the people of the several States, the only way in which the Constitution may be amended. The greatest champion of American civil liberties, Thomas Jefferson, toward the end of his eventful life and shortly before his death, said:

"Some men look at constitutions with sanctimonious reverence, and deem them, like the Ark of the Covenant, too sacred to be touched. They ascribe to the men of the preceding age a wisdom more than human, and suppose what they did to be beyond amendment. I knew that age well; I belonged to it and labored with it. It deserved well of its country. It was very like the present, but without the experience of the present—I am certainly not an advocate of frequent and untried changes in laws and constitutions—but I know also that laws and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind."

Let us remember that the Constitution is not an end in itself, but a means to an end. It is not the master of the people, but their servant. As it has been amended in the past, so it will inevitably be amended in the future when circumstances make this necessary. The constitution of every government must keep pace with the necessities of the people. But never, so long as we are liberty-loving Americans, will the Constitution of the United States be amended to change our republican form of government into dictatorship or monarchy, or to surrender our rights of local self-government.

THE RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE STATES

The existence of rights assumes the existence of corresponding responsibilities. State rights of themselves create State responsibilities. That political entity asserting the right to self-government must be prepared to govern itself. We in Texas, more perhaps than those who live in other States, believe in State rights and local self-government. The history of our State, once a free and independent nation, treating on equal terms with other nations of the world, is a proud heritage. Even today the State of Texas possesses rights guaranteed specifically when admitted into the Union which no other State can claim. Other States may surrender their sovereignty, but none of our generation of Texans, whether native born or citizens by adoption, will ever surrender that political freedom consecrated in blood on the mud floors of the Alamo and confirmed in flame at San Jacinto. But demanding these rights, as we do, we must be honest with ourselves. We insist that the Constitution of the United States guarantees to us the right of local self-government. And so demanding, and so insisting, we must fully recognize our own responsibility and our officers must faithfully discharge their duty; otherwise our own people will be fully justified in surrendering the governing power to a capable government. The Constitution and Government of the United States were intended to promote, as they have promoted, the best interests of all the people of the Nation, not just the best interests of all the people of Texas who embraced the Constitution when the State was admitted to the Union.

The complexity of modern business, the rapidity of modern communication and transportation have brought all the people of our country so close together that the economic problems of a single State may easily become the economic problems of all other States. An unsound economic condition in a single State may impinge sharply upon the economic welfare of the Nation. Failure of one State to enact necessary legislation or adequately enforce its laws may bring about a general breakdown of law enforcement throughout the country. A weak, inefficient State may become like an infected house in a community. Either the inhabitants must clean it up for themselves or their neighbors will do it for them. In order to safeguard and protect the rights we claim we must demonstrate our willingness to enact, administer, and enforce laws sufficient to protect the best interests of our own State and to safeguard those in other States who may suffer from the inefficient handling of our own State affairs.

Specific instances where the nonuse of our own rights has brought about Federal action are well known. The Federal narcotic law was passed because many States could not, or would not, enact and enforce laws sufficient to deal with the menace of the rapidly spreading traffic in habit-forming drugs. Only the failure of the States to deal with the problem of stolen automobiles could have brought about the passage of a Federal law under the commerce clause of the Constitution. Kidnaping is a crime under the laws of every State in the Union. Yet the pitiful inefficiency of the several States in putting down this crime which strikes at the fireside of every American family cannot be denied. The complete failure of local and State officers to arrest, convict, and punish kidnapers brought about the passing of what is known as the "Lindbergh law." Except for the utter breakdown of State law enforcement, it would never have been necessary for the Federal Government to intervene. I am no reformer, but I must say that there is a vast difference between strict law enforcement, vigorous prosecution, and prompt punishment of criminals violating the laws of the United States and the namby-pamby way in which our States deal with crime. The violator of a Federal law is faced with prompt arrest, speedy trial, and just punishment. In our own State, as well as in many other States, we find that the protection of every technicality is thrown about a criminal by the very State whose laws he has flagrantly violated. He is seldom arrested; often never tried, and when tried and convicted he is more than apt to be paroled or pardoned for insufficient reasons. I do not hesitate to say that the indiscriminate parole and pardon of multitudes of State offenders is a disgrace to our State governments and a menace to the Nation.

Even now there is a bill pending in the Congress of the United States, a bill to subject the oil business, Texas' greatest natural resource, to the control of a Federal bureau. It is specifically and effectively charged that the duly elected railroad commission, attorney general, Governor, and other law-enforcing agencies of Texas are either incapable or unwilling to control waste in the production of oil, and that the way in which the State deals or fails to deal with this problem is bringing great injury to the Nation as a whole. I do not believe these charges are true, but nevertheless they are made in support of this bill. And unless these warnings are heeded, this great industry in which our State institutions and our public-school system have property rights may soon be managed and directed by a Federal bureau. I have faith in our officers and know that they have the ability to enforce our State conservation laws. I do not want this thing to happen, and hope our officers will demonstrate always that we are capable of exercising the rights of local self-government with respect to the production of oil if it takes the services of every sheriff and ranger in Texas.

Now on every hand we hear the doleful statement that we are living the twilight of State rights. Those who would extinguish the States make it appear in every conceivable manner that our State governments are incapable and inefficient; that they do not secure to their own people the rights guaranteed by the Federal Constitution; they do not regulate labor problems that affect other States, and that they do not afford adequate protection and security to unfortunates within the borders of the State. Little as we like it, there is much truth in the charges. The argument is the foundation of practically every Federal law which has touched upon the affairs of the States and has brought about the building up of a Federal bureaucracy of magnitude and with powers undreamed of when our Constitution was written and adopted.

The failure of the States to exercise the rights and powers which are theirs has led to Federal encroachment that can only be attributed to a disposition of the States themselves to evade their own responsibilities and unload their own duties upon the Federal Government. I know, and every lawyer knows, that the States have ignominiously and abjectly surrendered their sovereignty in every instance where an opportunity was presented to benefit financially by the contributions of the Federal Government. Seemingly the States have forgotten the price that must be paid for such cowardly and unworthy action. If the States are to be financially supported from the National Treasury they will inevitably be governed in detail as to every such expenditure by Federal authority. The people of Texas have elected Senators and Representatives and sent them to Washington to represent the State of Texas. This State has the most powerful congressional delegation in the Capital. The concerted influence of our two great Senators and our Congressmen, numbering among them the chairmen of most of the important committees, is so powerful that should the people of Texas demand it they could prevent almost any encroachment upon State rights. But being representatives of the people they listen, as they should listen, to the voice of the people; and the people of Texas have urged—they have actually demanded—that these Senators and Congressmen support the passage of laws by which the Federal Government has increasingly come to control those matters which could and should be handled by the State itself. Texas is not alone in this. Almost all the States, through the medium of their Representatives in Congress, are singing the same discreditable tune.

How consistent are we, the people of the greatest State in the Nation, when on one hand we complain of the invasion of Texas by Federal agents and on the other hand run to Washington pleading for Federal aid and intervention in our State affairs? If any State in the Union should be self-sufficient and capable of handling its own social and economic affairs it is Texas. Yet our people rush pell-mell to Washington like a ragged and supplicating group of beggars beseeching the Federal Government to favor the great State of Texas with a dole sugar-coated by the term "State aid."

If we are capable of self-government; if we have any right to State government; if we are competent to solve our own problems, then why this rush to Washington every time there appears to be an opportunity to get more Federal money? Our own public-school system may be cited as an example. Under the Constitution of Texas the maintenance and support of this system are positively and directly guaranteed by the allocation of taxes for its benefit. But at this very time, the operation of our schools has resulted in the situation where the Governor has seen fit to plead successfully for Federal aid for the country schools of Texas, in the amount of one and one-half million dollars. I personally cannot understand the necessity for Federal aid for Texas schools when the State board of education has just reported that there will be a surplus of $2,500,000 at the end of the present fiscal year, ending August 31. Can we consistently complain of Federal intervention when we do not even budget our school system on a basis which can be supported by our fixed school revenues? Just how capable are we of demonstrating and showing good and sufficient reasons why we should be left alone in the administration of our internal affairs?

Thinking Texans cannot be blind to the effect of tremendous Federal expenditures within our State. We know that the expenditure of every Federal dollar in Texas is controlled by Federal boards and bureaus. The contributions always carry with them the power of this control, but I have heard no complaint that it may be "unconstitutional" for the Federal Government to expend untold Federal millions in the public improvements in this State. Surely we have not convinced ourselves that we are not paying for these contributions. Surely we have not lulled ourselves into the belief that we are getting all this without ultimate cost. But if we have failed to take into account the fact that we are indirectly paying and are to pay every penny of this money in direct and indirect taxation, and to pay even a greater price in Federal control of our State affairs, then we are due to have a very rude awakening. Chief Justice Marshall truly said that the power to tax is the power to destroy. If we demand the dole, then we may expect higher taxes, and if Federal money is spent, we may expect Federal supervision and control.

We have seen, during the crisis through which we have just passed, the necessity for the Federal Government to directly donate hundreds of millions of dollars to relieve suffering and distress. I think most of us have thought that the responsibility for taking care of the poor rested first with their families; then with the cities and counties; and then with the States. Never before in this land of plenty has it been considered necessary for any State in the Union to demand money from the Federal Government for such purposes. The plain truth is that our States, proudly calling themselves "sovereign", have dodged their responsibilities and loaded them upon the Federal Government. Our States are responsible for a condition where too many shiftless and trifling loafers, both white and black, are being comfortably supported at the expense of the honest, hard-working taxpayers of this Nation. This undoubtedly jeopardizes the title of sovereignty of our States. Our Constitution does not guarantee every man a comfortable living at the expense of taxpayers. He can only expect an opportunity to work and to earn a living. This is being afforded through the great Public Works program. Those who want to work will be given an opportunity to work, and I confidently make the prediction that this program will be so successful that there will not be a single Federal relief agency of any kind maintained in Texas after November 1.

THE REMEDY

While none of us believe that State rights will ever be destroyed, we must not be so blind as not to recognize that danger. We must avoid any possibility of the destruction of our Government as it is now constituted by reawakening to our responsibilities. Lawyers, especially, directly and indirectly, both through their public statements and their private counsel to those who rely upon their judgment, exercise tremendous influence upon public affairs.

The lawyers of Texas might well dust off their copies of the Constitution and reacquaint themselves with the provisions of this ancient charter of human rights and liberties. Especially is it the duty of lawyers to see that the younger members of the profession are encouraged to know and understand the Constitution and its history, to recognize it and be familiar with its principles, not as some mystic document, chiefly useful as something to read at a Fourth of July celebration, but as the familiar companion and guiding light of our everyday affairs. We should make very sure that the glories and beauties of the Constitution should be taught in all our schools, so that future generations will grow up with intelligent knowledge of the rights and privileges guaranteed by that old compact, so wisely adopted by the founders and saviours of this Nation. Let us also have more harmony between the various branches of our State government. Let our legislature enact laws adequate to reduce the cost of government to our citizens, to protect our people efficiently against organized crime and vice, and adequately deal with our economic problems. Let the government of Texas stand upon its own feet, demonstrate its ability to cope with the problems of its own people, with the hope that other States may do likewise, and the people of Texas will never be ruled by a Federal bureaucracy. Let these things be done, to the end that we shall be safeguarded in the rights of individuals to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the right of local self-government will be forever maintained and cherished.

LOBBYING ACTIVITIES IN CONNECTION WITH HOLDING COMPANY BILL

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate consider at this time Senate Resolution 165.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution (S. Res. 165), which had been reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with amendments, on page 1 to strike out lines 1 to 7, inclusive, as follows:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of the lobbying activities in connection with the so-called "holding-company bill." The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendations.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of all lobbying activities and all efforts to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation, directly or indirectly, in connection with the so-called "holding company bill", or any other matter or proposal affecting legislation. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation.

On the same page, line 12, after the word "employ", to strike out "such" and insert "and to call upon the executive departments for"; and on page 2, line 7, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$50,000", so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed to make a full and complete investigation of all lobbying activities and all efforts to influence, encourage, promote, or retard legislation, directly or indirectly, in connection with the so-called "holding-company bill", or any other matter or proposal affecting legislation. The committee shall report to the Senate, as soon as practicable, the results of its investigation, together with its recommendation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold such hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions and recesses of the Senate in the Seventy-fourth and succeeding Congresses, to employ and to call upon the executive departments for clerical and other assistants, to require by subpena or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $50,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the resolution, and I wish to know if the Senator from Alabama has any objection to including in the resolution a direction that the committee to be appointed be instructed to investigate the activities of any person on the Federal pay roll, or drawing money from the Federal Government for services, in causing the farmers to come to Washington and assemble here on May 13 to 16 last?

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that personally I would not favor any direction to single out any particular type or any particular group, but I will state that I have drawn the amendment which has just been agreed to in such way that the resolution includes the right to investigate any effort of any kind or type to influence or promote or retard the passage of legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I listened with great care to the reading of the resolution because the Senator had assured me that it did undertake to cover everything, but I was not certain that it would cover this matter. While we are trying to clean up the situation generally by an investigation, I see no reason why the amendment I suggest should not be adopted. I have the amendment in the particular phraseology which I send to the desk.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, may we have the amendment read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the proper place in the resolution the following:

That said committee be requested and directed to investigate the activities of any and all persons drawing any pay from funds furnished by the Federal Government, in causing the farmers from all over the country to gather in the city of Washington, from about May 13 to May 16, 1935.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, the amendment is an assertion that that did happen. The resolution is broad enough to cover the situation if it did happen, but the amendment assumes as a matter of fact that it did happen.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no intention to make such an assumption. I merely want to draw the matter to the attention of the Senate and have it included in the resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLACK. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON. I do not believe there is any justification for the adoption of the amendment. The resolution, as stated by the Senator from Alabama, is broad enough to authorize the investigation of any effort to influence or control legislation. In my judgment, it would be improper to single out an individual or group as the proposed amendment seeks to do. I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Let me say a word further, and then I shall yield the floor to the Senator from Delaware. I have no doubt in the world that the resolution as drawn would permit an investigation of the matters referred to in his amendment. Personally I should object to any direction to the committee which singled out one particular circumstance and directed mandatorily that it be investigated. It is my judgment that if the committee should be directed to go into any one particular field, it should be an investigation of the holding company bill situation, activities in connection with the T. V. A. legislation, and possibly some others which have apparent reason to be investigated.

My objection to the proposal of the Senator from Delaware is simply that it singles out one thing. Quite a number of Senators have mentioned to me that they wish investigation made of certain activities which they have suggested in reference to the particular resolution. One Senator, for instance, wanted an investigation of activities against the pure food and drug bill. Another Senator was interested in an investigation of activities against the agricultural program. A number of other Senators are interested in other activities.

I hope the Senator will not insist upon the adoption of his amendment, which attempts to single out a single group for investigation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator give us assurance that if he should be a member of the investigating committee he would endeavor to carry out the suggestion made in the proposed amendment?

Mr. BLACK. Of course, I should not assume to speak for what the committee might do. I state that it would be my judgment that the proper way for the committee to proceed would be not to announce in advance that which it intended to do. Experience in the past has demonstrated to me that that is the best way to frustrate an investigation. The most effective way to investigate anything is to investigate it before too much public announcement has been made as to the plans and intentions of the committee.

It is my judgment that any matter in which a Senator may be interested should be presented to the full committee in order that they might determine at that time what was worthy of investigation under the power to be given the committee in connection with the various subjects suggested. Personally I should not be willing to say that any Member of the Senate should commit himself in advance that he would or might do this or that. I think it would not be a proper procedure.

So far as I am concerned as a member of any investigating committee, it is my opinion that if there is sufficient reason to believe that something has been done which should be exposed to the public gaze, the committee should investigate it.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I shall not address the Senate upon the amendment. I have suggested it in good faith. I have suggested it because of certain information which came to me in the regular way with respect to the matter about the time the farmers came here.

I desire to take this occasion to address the Senate briefly on another subject.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to discuss briefly an amendment to the resolution if the Senator will yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Arizona for the purpose indicated by him.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for yielding and I hope he will not think me ungracious in view of his yielding when I say I support the view of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] on this particular question.

I am very much in favor of the proposed investigation. I think it ought to be made. There may be some wayfaring Senator who does not know or who is oblivious of the fact that there was aroused an intense lobby against the bill and also an intense lobby for the bill. There may be some Senator who does not know that, and the resolution, of course, would bring the fact to light.

Mr. President, I invite attention to lines 10 and 11 of the resolution where it is proposed to strike out the word "such" and insert the words "and to call upon the executive departments for clerical and other assistants." I doubt the wisdom of an investigating committee of the Senate calling upon the executive branch of the Government for clerical and other assistants, not assistance, it will be observed—meaning "persons." I believe the country wishes this investigation made. I know of no action which would be more welcomed by our constituents generally than this investigation. The investigators and the honorable committee to be appointed by the Chair would be harassed and embarrassed when it became known that their clerical assistants, their clerks and experts, were drawn from the executive department.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield for the purpose of enabling me to make a statement to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. I am certain the Senator from Arizona misunderstands the purport of that language in the resolution. In any investigation which involves departmental records and matters of that sort, necessarily there is a great deal of information which must be obtained from the records, and the matter of copying such records and furnishing them to the committee involves a great deal of clerical assistance which might as well be furnished by the department as to be paid for out of the committee funds. I think every Senator who has served on an investigating committee has had the experience and found that it very much facilitates the investigations if they were able to call upon the executive departments for such assistance. I am sure that is the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. ASHURST. If that be the purpose, I shall conclude by saying that the Senator from Missouri, with his usual crystal clearness, has made it obvious to me that if that be the purpose there could be no reasonable objection to the amendment.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Permit me to say to the Senator from Arizona that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is correct in his statement. Similar language has been included in many other resolutions providing for such investigations.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

If the Senator from Delaware will be so kind as to allow me to utter another sentence, let me say that, with the understanding that the clerical help, the stenographers, the attorneys, the investigators, the experts, are not to be drawn from the staff of the executive departments, but that the executive departments are to be called upon for documents and copies thereof, and even for the purpose of explaining them, I am perfectly content; but, I repeat, in an investigation of this kind I doubt the wisdom of having in the employ of the committee anyone who is in the employ of the executive branch of the Government. With the explanations made by my friends from Missouri and from South Carolina, however, I am perfectly content.

I wish to thank the Senator from Delaware for yielding to me.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Since I have an engagement that I need to fill, if possible, I simply desire to say to the Senator from Delaware that if he is going to speak on some other subject, and not on this, I should appreciate it if he would permit us to have action on the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a minute. The Senator from Arizona has raised a question, and the Senator from Missouri has answered it in a way which is not entirely satisfactory to me. Do I understand that it is the purpose that the committee may call upon investigators now employed by the Government and may press them into service in making this investigation?

Mr. BLACK. I may state to the Senator that it is absolutely impossible for the Senate to adopt a resolution which will confer upon any committee an absolute right to call upon the executive branch of the Government and to secure assistance from it. I doubt, however, if in a long time there has been a single investigating committee which has not utilized some of the agencies of the various executive departments.

For instance, in connection with the investigation of ocean and air mail contracts, our committee called on the Interstate Commerce Commission to know if they could let us have temporarily some clerks who were more or less familiar with the system of accounting and the system of bookkeeping, and so forth, which was used by the companies we investigated. We obtained some assistance from that source. We called on the Commerce Department for some assistance on the part of those who were peculiarly familiar with shipping, and obtained that assistance. I understand that the committee of which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is a member has found it necessary to obtain and has obtained, without any provision in the resolution authorizing it, assistance from some of the other departments; I believe the Senator said the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator will pardon me, we have received assistance from many departments of the Government, which has very greatly facilitated the investigation and reduced the expenses of the committee. At the same time, I did mention to the Senator from Alabama that at present we are receiving very valuable assistance from the Interstate Commerce Commission, which is furnishing material which it would be of great disadvantage and great trouble for us to gather for ourselves, and which would result in added expense to the Government if obtained by a new organization.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to what the Senator from Arizona has so well said. He referred in particular to the holding-company bill, which, as he pointed out, is probably the best example of having more lobbying done on both sides than any other bill which has been before Congress. I agree with him and I agree with the Senators from Alabama and from Missouri that it may very well be wise to have an investigation, but it ought to be an impartial investigation. While the holding companies are made defendants on one side, it is well known that there are other defendants besides them who were lobbying for the other side; and all of us who are anxious to have the work done properly are anxious that the country shall be informed as to what was done on both sides.

If certain persons are to be taken from the various Government departments to assist in the investigation, the investigating committee may find itself having in its employ a person who is trying to protect someone for whom he is working. For instance, take the Power Commission, which is very much interested in this bill, and was largely responsible for its being drawn, and had its counsel up here lobbying for it all the time. That is well known to the country and well known to all of us. The facts with respect to it ought to be made known; and we ought not to call, for instance, upon the Power Commission to aid in this investigation.

I am not asking that anything be done about the matter. The Senator from Arizona pointed it out and reached the conclusion that with the purpose in mind explained to him, he was satisfied with it, and I have no desire to pursue the matter further.

With respect to the amendment I offered, I desire to say that I should very much prefer to withdraw the amendment than to have it rejected, because if it should be rejected it might deprive the committee of authority to do what I wish to have done. For that reason I withdraw the amendment, but I express the hope that the committee may carry out my request and make some investigation of that matter.

Mr. President, I dislike to detain the Senator from Alabama, but I have had pending here for some days a resolution which I desire to discuss, and it seems to me the chances of getting it before the Senate at any time in the near future are not very bright.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I believe there is to be no further discussion of the resolution.

Mr. HASTINGS. I understand that two Senators wish to discuss the resolution.

Mr. BLACK. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I believe we can adopt the resolution. I do not know any Senator who wishes to speak against it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I desire to occupy 2 or 3 minutes in connection with an explanation of my own feeling about the resolution which is now before the Senate.

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall not delay the Senate longer than a few minutes.

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator from Delaware will yield for the purpose of allowing the resolution to be voted on, I am perfectly willing to make my remarks about the resolution after it shall have been agreed to.

Mr. HASTINGS. If that can be done, I will yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will say the same thing. I wish to say something about the resolution, but I am willing to say it afterward.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no objection to the question being put to the Senate as to whether the resolution shall be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution, as amended.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK. I thank the Senator from Delaware for his courtesy.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM AND ADJOURNMENT

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, some days ago, in my absence, the distinguished Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] was good enough to submit, in my behalf, the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 20):

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That when the Congress shall have completed its legislative program, except the revenue bill, it shall adjourn until noon on Monday, November 18, 1935;

Further resolved, That between the day of adjournment and November 18, 1935, the proper committees of the two Houses are requested to study the financial conditions of the Government as to income and expenses and make such recommendations as they find necessary to balance the Budget and begin the reduction of the national debt;

Further resolved, That when the Congress reconvenes on November 18, 1935, such revenue bill as such committees may recommend shall be the first order of business.

Mr. President, this resolution is the result of a sincere effort on my part to make some suggestion that would be helpful—helpful to the Congress itself and helpful to the country as a whole.

I think it is reasonably safe to say that at the time the President's tax message was read to the Senate, and for some days thereafter, a great majority of the Senate had the impression that the President did not expect his recommendations to be carried out at this session. When the Finance Committee met a day or two thereafter the distinguished senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] made some effort to have the proposal attached to the resolution extending the nuisance taxes, but this, by a large majority, was rejected. A day or two later we ascertained from newspaper reports and otherwise that a sincere effort would be made in the Senate to take up the matter at this session. Shortly afterward we found that the President desired this course of action.

I assume there is enough opposition to this resolution to defeat it. I assume those opposed to it may properly be divided into three or more groups. There are those who will want to do the job now, because that is the desire of the President. There are some who hope and believe the legislation may be passed speedily, and they, therefore, would rather stay here and complete it than to return the middle of November. Then there is that sincere and earnest group of Senators who believe this will at least prove to be the entering wedge to that economic theory that the welfare of the Nation requires that the wealthy people of the Nation should bear a greater share of the financial burden of the Government; and I suppose there may be some also who agree with the President in promoting this legislation because of the new social order or reform it may bring about.

Mr. President, I do not question the sincerity of those who disagree with me. I shall undertake to show, however, that there is merit in my proposal, and that it is worthy of support.

It is needless for me to point out how important it is that a tax bill be carefully considered by the committees of both Houses. Under normal conditions, that is done. I have no doubt that under the leadership of the distinguished Chairman of the Committee on Finance of the Senate every effort will be made to do it in this case, even though we are compelled to take the matter up in the month of July. But may I call attention to how impossible it will be for the chairman and the members of his committee to carry out their good intentions? The Congress has been in session for more than 6 months, and during that time has been considering and passing legislation of the greatest importance. The fact that some of us look upon much of it as harmful rather than helpful does not weaken the statement I make, for many bills were indeed weighty measures, and were given laborious consideration. For the committee and the Congress to begin the study and consideration of a tax bill now is unreasonable. The work cannot be adequately and well done in a short time. This would be true if we were physically and mentally at our best. The fact that we are worn out, our patience almost exhausted, makes certain that we shall do a poor job.

These facts are emphasized when it is borne in mind that there are likely to be in the Senate many different views upon this subject, views which cannot be reconciled. A complete and exhaustive hearing and study by the committee would go a long way toward harmonizing these views.

Information could thus be made available to many of us who do not know now what ought to be done, and will not be able to learn from the information gathered from a few interested persons who may voluntarily appear before the committee.

I have stated on many occasions my opposition to many things, if not most things, that have been done by this administration. I have protested time after time against the delegation of the power of the Congress to the Executive. Such acts, in my judgment, are the opening wedge to a dictatorship, and, unless checked, will ultimately destroy our form of government.

The most dangerous of all these is the appropriation of money. The placing in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury of the sum of $2,000,000,000 upon the express condition that neither he nor the President should be required to account to the Congress for a period of 3 years was a dangerous and an un-American thing to do. The purpose of the authority given was itself dangerous. The huge sums which the Congress has turned over to the President, at one time $3,300,000,000, and at another time $4,880,000,000, were acts which will at some time shame the Congress.

Even though no major scandal develops in the use of these funds, thinking people will shudder at what might have happened when the Congress thus abdicated its power and authority and violated its plain duty.

The demand by the President for legislation that is known to be beyond the power of Congress to enact is to me a shocking thing. The readiness with which Congress yields to such demand is deplorable.

Even though these things be as serious as I believe them to be, they can in time be overcome. But there is one thing confronting the Nation that is more serious than these, and that is the ever-increasing deficit and the ever-increasing public debt, which in the end may mean uncontrolled inflation. I know there are those who think this is a mere bugaboo, but to me and millions of other citizens it is a very real danger.

The fact that it has become necessary for the banks of the country and the Government itself to protect the Government bond market shows how very close we are to a financial crisis. It has been said by persons who ought to know that a decrease of 10 percent in the price of Government bonds would make it necessary to close nearly every bank in the country.

It is hardly worth while to review the history of this administration with respect to deficits and Budget balancing. It is sufficient to call attention to the fact that in 2 years the national debt has been increased more than 40 percent, and that we are spending each year two or three times as much as our annual income. There is no effort to economize on the part of the President; no effort to economize on the part of the Congress. The effort is confined to bringing about "the more abundant life" by planning and manipulating the material things of life. It is argued that the balancing of the Budget must wait upon the routing of the depression, but every day we sit here, almost every message the President sends here, makes more certain that the depression is to continue for a long time to come.

The only way we will be able to end this spending spree is to boldly prepare a tax bill that will eliminate any deficit for the coming fiscal year. As we begin to study that situation and begin to levy taxes upon everything we can think of and upon every person that has anything more than enough to sustain himself, we shall better appreciate how necessary it becomes to begin to economize. We shall see how important it is to begin to eliminate and consolidate bureaus and abolish useless offices in an effort to reduce Government expenses by at least 25 percent. We shall see how important it is to stop paying out Government money to persons who are doing nothing more than raking leaves and picking up paper in the public parks. We shall see how necessary it becomes to reduce the relief rolls and confine the public-works program to essential and useful projects.

In my judgment, we must find some method of drastically reducing expenses before we can even hope to balance the Budget. After we have done our best in this direction we shall not be able to put our financial affairs in order by increasing the income tax in the higher brackets; we shall not be able to do it by increasing the taxes on large corporations and reducing them on the small; we shall not be able to do it by any new scheme of taxing the inherited wealth.

In a democratic form of government like ours the only way in which we can hope to keep the expenses of government down to a minimum is to make the whole Nation tax-conscious. So long as a great majority of the people are free from any direct tax, or free from increase in taxes, just so long will there be a demand for increased expenditures. We must remember always that the right of franchise is equal, and the poor have the same right and the same responsibilities in electing those who make and enforce the laws, as have the people of wealth.

A proportionate responsibility in the burden of taxation, as nearly as may be, ought to be provided for. It is agreed by all that this ought to be based upon the ability to pay.

I think it will be admitted by all that no such program as this can be worked out in a few weeks in midsummer by a Congress whose membership, to say the least, is not in the best frame of mind.

My own thought in suggesting that the Congress adjourn until November 18, and let the committees of the two Houses work upon this program 6 or 8 weeks before the Congress reconvenes is that we would thus have the advantage of the study of such committees. The President and the Treasury Department would have the advantage of that information in preparing the next Budget for submission to the Congress. We could dispose of the suggestions of the President of eliminating unnecessary holding companies in all lines of business and discouraging unwieldy and unnecessary corporate surpluses, instead of having the suggestion hanging over the heads of such corporations, without knowledge as to what is contemplated or what is to be done by the Congress. Such suggestions are not helpful to recovery. The uncertainties that confront them prevent business concerns from going forward.

I realize that no such plan as balancing the Budget is contemplated in the President's message sent to us on June 19. In that message, and subsequently, he emphasized that he has a twofold purpose, one incidentally to raise revenue, and the other to bring about a better social order.

I think it is unreasonable to expect Congress to stay here and pass legislation in an effort to change a social order that has existed for so many years, and under which the country has grown to be the most prosperous and powerful country in the world.

The President says:

> The transmission from generation to generation of vast fortunes by will, inheritance, or gift, is not consistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people.

Again he says:

> Such inherited economic power is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power was inconsistent with the ideals of the generation which established our Government.

It will be observed from these quotations from the President's speech that he has reached the conclusion that the transmission of vast fortunes is inconsistent with the ideals and sentiments of the American people, and is as inconsistent with the ideals of this generation as inherited political power. In other words, the President goes so far as to say that the people of the Nation are as much opposed to permitting a man with a vast fortune to pass it on to his heirs as the people during the Revolutionary times were opposed to permitting America to be ruled by a king who would at death pass his crown to his eldest son.

I think it is not too much to say that the President has overdrawn the illustration in his effort to impress the importance of his program upon the Congress. From almost the very beginning it has been the policy of America to permit wealthy persons to dispose of their estates as they pleased.

The great George Washington was one of the wealthy men of his time, and that fact was known to the people who established our form of government, yet no limitation was placed upon the accumulation of wealth by the framers of the Constitution, and no such issue as is involved in this proposition has ever been submitted for decision to the American people.

Washington demonstrated his desire that America should be free from any appearance of being ruled by any individual or any dictator by setting the all-time precedent of only two terms as President for any man.

We cannot afford to be rushed off our feet with the suggestion of Dr. Townsend to pay every person in the land who has reached the age of 60 years $200 a month; nor can we afford to adopt the E. P. I. C. plan of Sinclair; nor have we yet been convinced that the share-the-wealth movement sponsored by the distinguished senior Senator from Louisiana is to be the salvation for the country.

Neither do I think we can afford to take the less radical suggestion of the President of the United States and approve it without a better knowledge of the effect it will have upon the country as a whole and without in all fairness having submitted it to the people of the Nation for a definite decision.

The President calls attention to the fact that a man having a $5,000,000 income pays at the same rate as one whose income is a million dollars. Of course, when a man's income reaches the huge sum of $5,000,000 annually, his ability to pay a large sum to the Government is perfectly apparent. It has been suggested that the rate should be increased until out of the last two million received as income the Government should take $1,400,000 and leave the taxable $600,000.

I am frank to say I do not know whether it is a wise policy to take so much of a person's income or not. There are those who insist that the Government gains nothing by increasing the taxes in the higher brackets, because the man who has been able to create such an income is liable to withdraw his money from the business activities which have permitted him to accumulate such a fortune and place it in staple securities at a low rate of interest. It is the expectation of large returns which induces capital to invest in new enterprises and new ventures of all kinds. It can hardly be expected that a wealthy man will invest his money in any kind of business when he knows that the Government will take 70 or 80 percent of any profit he may make, while he must take all the chances of a loss. It is contended that taxes which are too high not only prevent business from going forward, but that the Government would collect a greater sum in the aggregate if the rate were made lower instead of higher than the present rates.

These are important questions upon which intelligent and honest men may differ. They ought to be decided only after careful consideration and investigation and without prejudice.

In this connection I might say that I have for some time had in mind the desirability of permitting persons and corporations to deduct from their income as an expense a certain portion of the cost incurred in constructing new buildings, repairing old buildings, and so forth, involving the employment of labor and the purchasing of new materials. My thought has been that this might in some degree start things moving a little faster and without seriously affecting income.

There are very real differences of opinion with respect to the President's proposal that there be a difference of 6 percent between the rate of tax upon small corporations and the rate upon the large corporations. The President also suggests that we might well provide a tax on dividends in order to prevent evasion by the large corporations by the organization of affiliates. This suggestion, it may well be noted, if adopted, largely disposes of the elimination of holding companies in all lines of business which the message suggests is too complicated to be disposed of in the remaining days of the Congress.

These recommendations with respect to corporations show very clearly that the President is much more interested in changing the social order than he is in raising revenue. They are punitive, and clearly intended as such. I doubt whether so-called "big business" is a menace to America today. I doubt whether it has ever been. It has become necessary for Congress many times to regulate and control it in many respects in order to prevent some unscrupulous man here and there from imposing upon the public. There is ample authority to do this and enough willing and anxious minds to apply the remedy. This is as it should be. The antitrust laws are important. If properly enforced, they ought to insure competition, which is the one stimulating thing in America which ought to be maintained. American institutions survived, however, for a long time before these laws were enacted. Corporations are prohibited from making campaign contributions. If these laws did not exist, we might find corporations contributing to both sides, and thus making sure that whoever won would be under some obligations to them. This would, of course, be a bad thing for a democracy like ours. I am not impressed with the suggestion that there is danger in the economic power possessed by several thousand stockholders who own a large corporation merely because of the amount of money invested or the amount of money earned. So long as other groups have the same right to go into the same kind of business, thus assuring reasonable competition, the public is fairly well protected; and the people of this generation need have no more fear for the safety of American institutions from this source than the people of other generations have had.

And, Mr. President, if we had the time to learn the facts, and the courage to tell the truth about them, I have no doubt we could find much to justify the existence of the so-called "big business." If we should trace the history of the kerosene lamp, the electric light, the electric refrigerator, the vacuum cleaner, the washing machine, the steamboat, the railroad, the street car, the airplane, the automobile, the telegraph, the telephone, the radio, the moving and talking pictures, much of the modern foods and medicines, as well as many other things which go so far to make up the high standard of living enjoyed by the masses of our people, we would find some great organization of wealth responsible for most if not all of them. They could afford to take the risks involved. True, it was done, most of it if not all of it, for gain, but that is of no great concern to the millions of men who have prospered because of the jobs these industries have furnished and are furnishing. Neither are the millions of people who are enjoying these developments alarmed about the concentrated economic power that made such things possible.

We must bear in mind also that individual wealth and the wealth of a corporation are not comparable. The large corporations are, speaking generally, owned by millions of our citizens, savings banks, insurance companies, churches, hospitals, and other charitable institutions. People of small means have invested in them because they have believed them to be safe. It is not reasonable, it is not equitable to compel such corporation to pay a tax of 17½ percent on its profits and permit a small corporation to pay 6 percent less. The mere statement of the fact that the large corporation may only earn 3 or 4 percent on the investment while the small one may earn 30 or 40 percent is sufficient to show the unfairness of such a proposal.

No, Mr. President; the real danger today is not to be found in the concentrated economic power which may be attached to wealth of any kind or in any form, in the private individual. The real danger is to be found in the concentration of political power and the concentration of public money in the hands of the present President of the United States. Think of a President complaining about the power that accompanies a fortune, the power possessed by a large corporation, when he has demanded and received from the Congress in a single appropriation the huge sum of $4,880,000,000; a sum to be expended as his own judgment may dictate. He may loan it, he may give it away, he may use it to send young men and women to college, he may use it in business ventures in competition with private capital, he may use it to aid one State or congressional district and punish another, and all this in the year in which he will be a candidate to succeed himself. One gets the impression that the President really believes that any kind of power is dangerous unless it be in his own hands.

I repeat that I am not impressed with this part of the message. I am much concerned about economy in government and the desirability of raising sufficient revenue to balance the Budget. I think this can only be done properly by the use of much time, energy, and patience. These essential things are not to be had without a congressional vacation.

Mr. President, I now desire to read an editorial by Mr. Raymond Moley in Today, which is reprinted in the New York Herald Tribune of this morning, under the heading, "Our Democratic Friends Plead for a Little Peace." The editorial by Mr. Moley is as follows:

FAITHFUL ARE THE WOUNDS OF A FRIEND—PROVERBS XXVII: 6

OUR DEMOCRATIC FRIENDS PLEAD FOR A LITTLE PEACE

(On reading Ecclesiastes—An editorial by Raymond Moley in Today)

There has rarely been a time when people yearned more unmistakably for serenity and certitude than they do now, but they seem to be getting it less and less.

Business men are getting so "sore" that they greet everything emanating from Washington with the bitterest epithets in their vocabularies. The same jumpy nerves are visible in official Washington itself.

This battle-to-the-death spirit is not going to solve anything. In fact, it has a tendency to create in this country precisely the issue the man in the street ought to fear above all things—bitter political conflict between those vested with the moral and economic responsibility of administering business and those who are vested with the political and no less moral responsibility of governing the country.

In the heat of conflict extremists on both sides conceive of the new deal's activities in patching up our civilization as bitter class warfare. I have often heard hotheaded Congressmen and administration subordinates in Washington speak of the necessity, "now that business is down", of clipping its wings and of crippling its means of locomotion in still more serious ways. The more naive exponents of this view are positive, as Mr. Bryan used to be, that a little group of bespattered and overupholstered gentlemen meet every day in a back room in Wall Street and plot with precision the enslavement of the American people. These gentlemen manipulate the price of stocks. They hammer out crosses of gold. They weave crowns of thorns for labor. They corrupt the press and otherwise bedevil mankind.

Among New Yorkers I hear equally fantastic things. The President listens only to dangerous Communists who scuttle in and out of his presence like messenger boys in a broker's office (ante 1929). He is pursuing a private vendetta against his old friends of Groton and Harvard. His advisers are all either impecunious theorists or men who have failed in business and are seeking Freudian compensation by socking business generally. * * *

I should be a poor judge of public opinion if I did not sense that large sections of the American public are getting a little tired of the fray. Better judges of public opinion, such as the President and his congressional leaders, probably have known it for some time and breathe a sigh of relief when they assure us that final action on the remainder of the 1935 program—the banking bill, the A. A. A., the T. V. A. amendments, and the tax proposals—can be had in a month. Wisely they offer the inference that they will then write finis to the 1935 program of the new deal. But it seems to be difficult for them to drag the actors off the stage. The actors are too intent upon what they are doing to see the restlessness of the audience and hear the mutterings of boredom.

Mr. Lippmann has also sensed this boredom of the public. He says that people have come to recognize the point where reform should stop and recovery be permitted to move unrestrained by "uncertainty." To my mind the man in the street has drawn no line so precise and intellectualized as this. The reaction of the man in the street is compounded of a strong measure of hope and a dash of cynicism. He believes in a new deal—this new deal, in fact. He does not believe that all the evils that vexed him will be exorcised by the magic of law. But he believes that things are better than they were and that some particular "raw deals" of the golden decade cannot be repeated. He knows that the President has tried gallantly to give him a better break and he appreciates the extent to which the President has succeeded. But he does not believe that business men are all devils and that unless crippled they will rise and smite him again. He is not concerned with abundance in the future. He wants a chance to enjoy the little additional abundance that he has now. Above all, he wants to get away from the strain of listening to so many people saying so many fierce things so many hours of the day. For the time being, he has heard enough about saving the world. * * *

The public is developing a terrific thirst for a long, cool swig of political quiescence. The danger to liberalism at such a moment is that a reactionary party will offer it a long, cool but narcotic swig of "normalcy." The Democrats can, if they will, meet the situation gracefully by the simple process of offering a quiet interlude for adjustment, education, and the taking of stock.

This is the best way for Democrats to save the precious gains they have made. They must realize that such a policy is not reaction, but rather the assurance of continued progress. They must recognize that every social crusade, from Cromwell to Wilson, has sooner or later come face to face with the stubborn refusal of human nature to rise too high or stay high too long.

"To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven."

Of course, Mr. President, everybody knows who Mr. Moley is and everybody knows how close he is to the President of the United States.

On the same page is an editorial from the Herald-Journal, of Greensboro, Ga., a part of which I read, as follows:

IT IS ROOSEVELT

[An editorial in the Herald-Journal, of Greensboro, Ga.]

The Atlanta Constitution concludes a double-leaded editorial on the President's program with this paragraph:

"We repeat what we have often said, that the most urgent need of the country is relief from the uncertainty that will inevitably exist as long as Congress is in session, and that the best service the national lawmakers can render at this time is to adjourn and go home, giving the people a rest and business a chance!"

I ask that the remainder of that editorial be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HATCH in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The remainder of the editorial is as follows:

As usual, the Constitution is not giving all sides of the picture, but is studiously trying to carry water on both shoulders.

It is President Roosevelt himself who has caused the country to have a case of jitters.

Why try to transfer the blame to Congress, to Tugwell, to Wallace, etc.?

It is Roosevelt himself who started out to fight the Supreme Court, but ran to cover when he found the reaction of the country to be in no uncertain terms that as between the Supreme Court and Roosevelt the country wanted the Supreme Court to stand.

Abraham Lincoln once said that when he took the oath to support and defend the Constitution he meant just that, and not to take the oath as a means to get into power to fight and defeat the Constitution of the United States.

Folks in Georgia and elsewhere should stay off the Federal Government pay roll before running around criticizing and attacking the motives of people who disagree with President Roosevelt.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Delaware took the President to task about the large appropriation of $4,800,000,000. A majority of the Senator's own party voted for that bill. Eleven Members on the Republican side, including the Republican leader, our esteemed friend the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], voted for the bill as an emergency measure, and only nine Republicans voted against it. It seems to me the Senator and his party are not as one as to the benefits of that bill, which intrusted to the President the amount of money of which the Senator from Delaware complains.

Mr. HASTINGS. I may call attention to the fact, which ought to be known to the Senator from Tennessee, that I speak only for myself. Unless he has something from the record that contradicts what I have said today, I think his statement is inappropriate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the whole record contradicts what the Senator has said.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield to me before he takes his seat?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Where I sat I could not hear all the Senator from Delaware said. He was making an argument, I assume, regarding the propriety of an increase in taxes. Did the Senator address himself to his resolution proposing a postponement of action on the tax program?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is what I tried to do. I may say to the Senator from New York that what I have said in support of that resolution was in an effort to indicate how important it is that the Congress get down to the point of trying to make "both ends meet", and that that could not be done if we tried to pass a tax bill in midsummer by staying here 3 or 4 additional weeks. That was the purpose of my argument.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator that, regardless of any motives he may have in mind—and I assume they are lofty ones—I agree fully with his idea that Congress ought not to attempt tax legislation at the moment. This is not the way to legislate. The matter of changing our tax laws is very important. I know how agitated my State is over the subject, and if, coupled with the worry they have over the idea of changing taxes, they are to have the additional worry that the bill is to be formulated and passed in a hurry, and, therefore, that it may be careless and perhaps dangerous legislation, that will largely increase the discontent of my immediate constituents.

I am firmly of the belief that tax legislation ought to be had to balance a well-considered Budget. Yet I question if the taxation should be in the form that is now proposed, doubtless I should find myself in opposition to many of the particular taxes proposed.

Regardless of that, there is a firm conviction in my mind that we ought not to attempt such legislation at this moment. It is too important to be considered hastily; the measure should be worked out carefully.

While I spoke somewhat facetiously the other day, I speak solemnly now when I say that the Congress is not in a physical condition to deal wisely with a matter so important as are taxes. I said then that I have seen many operations spoiled when performed by tired surgeons. When we come into the field of economics, where the problems involved are so important that it is necessary to use the very clearest thinking, I am convinced that we ought not now to attempt legislation of this character.

If it were to be legislation covering last year's income, that would be one thing; but no one contends that the taxes are to be retroactive. The point is that the proposed tax law is to apply to taxes due at the end of 1935. If the committees of the two Houses, at their leisure, could work out a tax plan and present it to Congress some time next fall or early in the winter, when it could be enacted after due study and consideration, I am confident it would be very much better legislation and certainly it would be better received by the country. To force upon the country now a radical change in our tax structure would add to the uncertainty and the discomfort felt throughout the business world, and there can be no question of that almost universal feeling of discontent.

There is now some sign of recovery, and it would be, I think, a very great mistake to proceed at this moment when there is no need for haste and when by waiting a few months we would have better legislation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I thank the Senator for his observations.

Mr. COPELAND. Regardless of the motives, worthy as they are in the mind of the Senator, I wanted to say for myself, representing my particular constituency, that I think we would be better satisfied to have more considerate legislation than that which will be hastily prepared. Likewise, I repeat, I am convinced that Congress is not in the frame of mind to operate wisely and conservatively on a matter of so great importance.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Delaware yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to add to what the Senator from New York has said that there is one further consideration, a very practical one, it seems to me—and I speak in no partisan sense but in an economic sense. The Senator has emphasized the fact that the proposed new taxes are not to be collected until the middle of next March, and that their present determination in no sense will hasten or affect the actual public revenue. In other words, not a penny of prospective Federal revenue is delayed or jeopardized by a decision on the tax bill postponed until next winter after competent, adequate, and deliberative consideration.

I wish to add to the reasons the Senator has given—and I think they are cogent, unanswerable reasons—that there is no possible way that the administration can associate its new tax program with its next Budget program except as it waits until next winter; and I can think of no more fundamental fallacy than to pretend to develop and promote an adequate supplemental tax program except as it be effectively related to paying all the bills which are being incurred by the Government in respect to its obligations. The two things must be effectively related in fairness to the American people and in fairness to the American taxpayer. They must be related in simple tax honesty and tax decency.

I do not believe there is going to be serious objection on the part of taxpayers to whatever assessment is necessary in order to pay the Government's legitimate bills, although this prospectus is becoming increasingly painful. I think the American taxpayer will be willing to face this burdensome duty, provided he can know that he is buying final public solvency, that the spending spree is over, and that he is not merely pouring more money into a bottomless well. I do not think it is fair to the American taxpayer to proceed with a tax program unrelated to the Budget program. If we are still to have an unbalanced Budget in spite of new taxes, then the new taxes have failed to serve their appropriate and essential purpose.

Supplementing the observations of the Senator from New York and the Senator from Delaware, and particularly adding to the reasons advanced by the Senator from New York, in behalf of a rational, considerate, deliberative postponement of this problem, I submit that it has to be postponed in order to relate it to the problem of spending and paying. It is not enough for congressional committees merely to inquire where and how new tax revenues can be obtained. It is more necessary—and it is prerequisite—to inquire how much new revenue is required to produce a balanced Budget after waste, experiment, and extravagance have ceased. We do not and cannot know these things now. There seems to be no thought of presently making any such inquiry. We are merely to soak a few tax victims. Such process is an affront to tax logic and tax sanity. Rational postponement is both desirable and necessary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 8632. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933; and

H. J. Res. 347. Joint resolution to provide for the compensation of pages of the Senate and House of Representatives from July 1, 1935, until the close of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

COMPENSATION OF PAGES

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I ask that the Chair lay before the Senate House Joint Resolution 347, which has just come from the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 347) to provide for the compensation of pages of the Senate and House of Representatives from July 1, 1935, until the close of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. GLASS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCHALL. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to use the eyesight of the clerk to make some remarks upon the pending agricultural bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, such consent cannot be granted under the rules unless by unanimous consent the rules are set aside for that purpose. This courtesy has been extended to the Senator from Minnesota on several occasions. I do not desire to take away that courtesy from him. However, one of the reasons for the rule is that it is impossible for the Senate to know what is going to be read until it is read. I am not going to object at the present time, but I reserve, during any period of the reading of the speech, the right to object to its further reading. With that understanding, I make no objection at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I make the same reservation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has asked unanimous consent that a speech by him be read by the clerk. The Senator from Nevada and the Senator from Tennessee both reserve the right to object later. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears none.

The speech of Mr. SCHALL is as follows:

DO AMERICAN FARMERS NEED A FEDERAL DICTATOR?

Mr. President, I am in favor of crop control by the farmers themselves through their own cooperative organizations, or through State and local or interstate agencies of their own direct control. But I am not in favor of extending until December 31, 1937, or for 2½ years longer, the Federal dictatorship of the A. A. A. which not unlikely may be declared unconstitutional at the next session of the United States Supreme Court.

I am in favor of an American system of crop control under the provisions of the United States Constitution and the constitutions of the respective States. I am not in favor of the Moscow system brought here from Russia by Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell and his fellow assistant college professors, who know less and care less about the future of American agriculture than any farmer in the United States.

I am not in favor of further extending the processing taxes on farm products until December 31, 1937. Up to date, as shown by the Treasury statement, these processing taxes on farm products have aggregated $850,000,000. They have burdened every processing industry that makes a home market for American farm products. They have worked to cut down the cash returns of the farm from the crops because every bushel of grain, bale of cotton, or hog or steer is bought subject to the conditions of the tax—and the farmer pays, just as the theatergoer pays, for the nuisance tax, or as the smoker pays the tobacco and cigarette tax.

Processing taxes on food products and fiber products are pyramided through all the industrial processes and commercial transactions and pile up the living costs on 30,000,000 families, increase the difficulty of the unemployed to obtain bare existence, and force the Government to increase the doles until we have 22,000,000 public charges, or 10 times as many as in 1932.

Besides cutting down our home market for the farm, the processing taxes burden both agriculture and American manufactures and destroy the ability of American producers to compete with industry abroad.

One of the outstanding results is the increasing flood of foreign imports. We are not only losing our markets abroad, through this handicap of $850,000,000 added to American production costs, but for the first time in American history imports for the vast majority of our staple farm products exceed our exports. New England and the cotton South join in the protest against the processing tax on cotton which has brought from Japan in the present fiscal year 10 times the volume of cotton goods that came in 1932 before the processing tax cursed our textile industry.

Moreover, if the N. R. A. is unconstitutional in its attempts to control intrastate industry—and all industries are intrastate, the Court finds, up to the point when their products move in interstate commerce—what can be said for the processing taxes on farm products moving to their home primary markets or mills?

The processing taxes levied by the A. A. A. are unconstitutional not only under the commerce clause of the Constitution, but grossly unconstitutional under the taxation clause—article I, section 8:

1. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

This power of taxation is exclusive and cannot be delegated by Congress to the President or any of his executive bureaus. The power to tax has been defined by the Supreme Court, since the day of Chief Justice John Marshall in the United States Bank case, 1819, as the "power to destroy." It is the chief power of Congress, as of parliamentary bodies in general under a national constitution. This taxation "power to destroy" is today exercised by an executive bureau, the A. A. A., and this bill, H. R. 8492, proposes to extend the power of the A. A. A. to levy unconstitutional processing taxes up to December 31, 1937.

In the 25 months of the A. A. A. to date, this executive bureau has levied $850,000,000 of processing taxes without the authority of the Constitution. In defiance of all the Supreme Court decisions since the United States Bank case of 1819, and in defiance of the decision of May 27, 1935, that we cannot delegate our legislative powers to the President and his bureaus, do we now propose to extend these A. A. A. taxes 31 months longer till December 31, 1937?

Do we propose to do this thing in the face of the reasonable likelihood that one or more of the 100 or more A. A. A. cases now pending in sundry courts may do to the A. A. A. in October what the Court did to the N. R. A. in May? We have had fair notice. We have no alibi. Before we meet again in the coming session in January 1936, we have every prospect that the A. A. A. will go the way of the N. R. A. into innocuous desuetude.

It is a shame to vote the great agricultural industry of America into the pending calamity of this A. A. A. mirage. It is like driving a caravan over the precipice in search for water that has no existence except a reflection on a floating cloud. We are presumed to have been elected to Congress to protect our respective constituencies—not to delude them to get their votes. Yet I am unable to persuade myself that there is a lawyer in Congress who does not feel, in his heart, that the A. A. A. has even less chance of a favorable Supreme Court decision, if possible than even the unconstitutional N. R. A.

The N. R. A. was unconstitutional, first, because it involved an unconstitutional delegation of the commerce power of Congress, and, second, because it involved an invasion of the Federal Government into intrastate business subject to State control. The A. A. A. is unconstitutional on both these grounds, involving the commerce power, and, furthermore, is unconstitutional as involving the chief power of all government, namely, the power to tax.

No pretense of emergency can come to the rescue of a processing tax levied by an executive bureau. Even granting an emergency, no one will pretend that the only way to meet it was to give an executive bureau the taxing power of Congress. The processing tax was a meddlesome experiment that has miserably failed, and has even created new dangers for agriculture by destroying both its home market and its foreign market and inviting a flood of imports that constitute a major menace both to agriculture and to all American industries that afford a market for farm products.

On economic grounds and on constitutional grounds, the processing taxes of the A. A. A. are both a menace to agriculture, a menace to the processing industries, a menace to the chief powers of Congress, and a menace to the perpetuity of this Republic, built upon the "indissoluble Union of indestructible States." They aid the destruction of both the home market and the foreign markets of the American farm. They help agriculture abroad and competing manufacturing industries abroad and help to undermine half the industries at home. They increase our production costs and our living costs. They strike down the industries that employ American labor and pay American taxes. They increase the army of the unemployed, now numbering nearly 12,000,000, and increase the number of public charges, now numbered at 22,000,000. Then why vote to extend their blight until December 31, 1937?

For over two generations, ever since the original homestead acts of the Lincoln administration in Civil War days, Congress has passed laws and voted appropriations to promote agriculture as the foundation of the country's food and clothing supply. The A. A. A. provides for a Federal dictatorship to dominate and destroy agriculture.

The Treasury daily statement carries at the top of its "emergency fund" allocations the vast sum of $1,722,000,000, subject to the will of our "Russian Commissar of Agriculture" to plow under the crops, convert the pigs into fertilizer, dictate the crops and acreage, fix the farm prices, levy processing taxes, distribute the funds, and commandeer the processors and the various distributing agencies. There are 53 pages of the pending A. A. A. extension bill and over 100 sections and subsections that give the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents autocratic powers over both the farmer and the processing industries which handle the crop and distribute the finished product to the consumer.

Section after section confers upon the Secretary autocratic powers, such as the following, found on page 11:

(3) Whenever the Secretary of Agriculture has reason to believe that the issuance of an order will tend to effectuate the declared policy of this title—

And so forth; or an autocratic taxing power such as the following, found on page 36 of the bill:

SPECIFIC TAX RATES

(2) In the case of wheat, cotton, field corn, hogs, peanuts, tobacco, paper, and jute, and (except as provided in paragraph (8) of this subsection) in the case of sugar cane and sugar beets, the tax on the first domestic processing of the commodity generally or for any particular use, or in the production of any designated product for any designated use, shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid at the rate prescribed by the regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture in effect on the date of the adoption of this amendment, during the period from such date to December 31, 1937, both dates inclusive.

Congress herewith is asked to delegate to the Secretary of Agriculture the legislative power in fixing the rate and the executive power of the treasurer, assessor, and sheriff in the levy, assessment, and collection of taxes.

Under the head of "Adjustment of rate", we read (p. 42):

And after July 31, 1936 (in the case of rice), rates of tax shall be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture in accordance with the formulae, standards, and requirements prescribed in this title, and shall, subject to such formulae, standards, and requirements, thereafter be effective.

Here the delegation of the tax power to the Secretary is as complete as under Secretary General Stalin in Moscow.

Not only have the farmer and the processor no voice in the taxes laid upon their intrastate industry but Congress itself has no voice in the tax rates which Congress alone, under the Constitution, has the power to exercise.

The taxing power and licensing power of the Secretary of Agriculture appears to be a star-chamber affair, to which even the State authorities may have access only by Federal permission. On page 49, beginning in line 10, we read:

Provided, That information furnished to the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to section 8d (1) hereof shall be made available only to the extent that such information is relevant to transactions within the regulatory jurisdiction of such authorities, and then only upon a written agreement by such authorities that the information so furnished shall be kept confidential—

And so forth. We are then asked to give a blanket endorsement to legalize and ratify all star-chamber tax levies made by the Secretary or by the approval of the President, as appears herewith on page 60:

(c) The taxes imposed under this title, as determined, prescribed, proclaimed, and made effective by the proclamations and certificates of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President and by the regulations of the Secretary with the approval of the President prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes (together with penalties and interest with respect thereto) prior to said date are hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed—

And so forth. We are asked to legalize, ratify, and confirm all the taxation acts of this star chamber, with no possible opportunity to know what we are legalizing.

Congress, which under the Constitution is presumed to exercise the complete legislative power, including the power to govern Federal taxation and commerce, is made by this bill a scapegoat and rubber stamp as completely as are the so-called "parliamentary" bodies of Russia, Italy, and Germany under the new deals over there—simply a "fall guy" for the star-chamber proceedings of a Federal bureau of racketeers.

We are asked, first, to authorize a dictator to ride agriculture; second, to provide a dictatorship for the government of the mills, packing houses, warehouses, and other facilities for marketing farm crops and the products thereof; third, to delegate our legislative functions to a Federal bureau with regard to power over both commerce and taxation; fourth, to legalize and ratify all the acts of this star-chamber proceeding; and, finally, to vote hundreds of millions from a Treasury deficit to aid drought, disease, and bugs to destroy agriculture, and all in the name of "agricultural adjustment" and "recovery."

Were the President to apply the A. A. A. policy of this bill to his weekly or monthly fishing expeditions his economic procedure, or modus vivendi, might be something like this:

First. He would prepare for his fishing trip by plowing under the bait supply and converting the angleworms and "shiners" into fertilizer.

Second. He would squander a huge sum on rusty hooks, broken rods, and rotten nets to reduce any possible catch of fish.

Third. He would subsidize all the fishermen likely to aid his expedition by giving them barracuda checks, trout checks, and sucker checks to bribe the fishermen to keep the fish away.

Then he would load his craft down with newspapermen, as he has the A. A. A., to concoct the largest fish stories, and direct the Government Printing Office to publish and distribute these fish stories as official executive documents.

In harmony with such policy he has already made Vincent Astor's fishing yacht Nourmahal the Noah's Ark of the new deal. He has also staged Henry A. Wallace as the gullible Jonah, who is trying, under his orders, to swallow the whale.

The next step is to require this Congress to ratify the fish stories, legalize all the Frankenstein foolery, rescue the expedition, and foot the bills under the White House order:

Go and fetch it! Congress! Bring it here to me, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy!

There was a day—a long day from March 4, 1789, to March 4, 1933, the American era of 144 years—when American farmers were freemen, the free yeomanry who fought our battles and occupied the chair of President at the White House. Under the plan of the new deal, the planned economy and planned emergency on which this Soviet measure is based, Prof. Rexford Guy Tugwell—or "Comrade Tugwell" as he is known in Moscow—points the American farmer to the European peasant as the model which he should emulate. The American farmer is presumed, under the Tugwellian theory of this bill, to submerge his rights to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness under a Federal dictatorship which tells him what to plant, what to destroy, what price he shall get, and deliver all his rights to his own soil to a group of political professors in Washington, as completely as the Russian peasant to the Soviet General Council, or the serfs of the Dark Ages to their feudal lords.

As my mind goes back to my early days, when I milked the cows, plowed corn, and drove the harvester on the old homestead, where I began life as a farm boy with my widowed mother, in a sod shanty on Minnesota's prairie frontier, and when I compare that life of freedom and self-reliant poverty with the condition of the Russian peasant under the Tugwell system of planned agriculture, where the farmer loses first his farm and crop, and then his liberty and his son and daughter, all subject to the rule of Moscow, I cannot bring myself to the support of a bill which sacrifices the freedom of the soil for which we have fought since the first pioneer settlement of America.

Let those who prefer the Russian system of centralized autocracy prove their faith by their works and take up the life of the Russian peasant under Moscow rule. Did you ever hear of a "collectivist", as Tugwell and Stalin call themselves, sticking to the soil of Russia longer than the time required to make a get-away? If there is one collectivist who by choice has pursued the life of a Russian farm peasant subject to the planned economy of Moscow, it is strange that the world has never heard of him. How many of the thousands of Russians who, it appears in census returns, form the leading nationality of New York City, would return to Russia if not deported? There are today in this country, the Sunday press tells us, 5,000,000 aliens embracing collectivist or communist doctrines. Even they prefer American institutions and life and liberty under an American Constitution to the serfdom of planned economy in Russia. I fail to understand why any American legislator can vote to establish on American soil a system which drives even its Russian advocates to get out of Russia and seek this land of liberty and opportunity. The remedy for this kind of bill would seem to be to deport the Tugwellites who like this kind of bill to the country where the Tugwell system belongs.

The American farmer needs no dictator. It was the plowman who, in 1776, as Emerson tells us, "fired the shot heard round the world"; and what American plowmen did in 1776 they are capable of doing again even in 1936. Next year, if we are allowed to have an election, may not be a good year for would-be dictators.

Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from Milo Reno, president of the National Farmers Holiday Association, which reads:

NATIONAL FARMERS' HOLIDAY ASSOCIATION, OFFICE OF THE PRESIDENT,
Des Moines, Iowa, July 1, 1935.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: The proposed amendments to the triple A, stripped of all deceit, simply mean that the power of the Secretary of Agriculture will be increased.

Both the House and Senate are well aware that the decision of the Supreme Court is entirely clear, that the power to tax or interfere with intrastate business cannot be delegated by Congress or the President to a head of a department, and it is hardly understandable how this measure can be consistently passed.

The effort to protect the Government as to recovery by those who had been robbed through an illegal processing tax is a repudiation of Government responsibility that to the average American mind is unthinkable. It is still more to be regretted that, in order to excuse this perfidious proposal, that its proponents have undertaken to camouflage their real intentions through propaganda, which is to protect the Government from being looted by the big packers. This is the rankest hypocrisy. They well know, or should know, that the packers made a larger profit than for many years, and they were not especially burdened by the processing tax. They lowered the price paid to the farmer to the full extent of the $2.25 a hundred processing tax and then a slice off of the consumer as well. A careful investigation of prices paid farmers in Canada and in the United States is evidence of this fact. The only one entitled to recover is the farmer, who had too much respect for his manhood, for his American citizenship, to sign a contract making the Secretary of Agriculture his dictator, giving him complete and absolute control of his affairs; who refuses to surrender his rights guaranteed under the Constitution, to appeal to our courts for redress.

This man was fined $2.25 per hundredweight, or approximately $5 a head, for every hog he sold. It was the confiscation of his property without due process of law—unconstitutional, un-American, reprehensible in every sense. This man is entitled to recover the $2.25 a hundred of which he was robbed under the contemptible disguise of a processing tax; so the attempt that is being made, and will perhaps succeed, to immune the Government from the penalty of its sins will affect only the man who has been deliberately robbed of values he had created and given nothing in return.

I hope that the Senators from the Middle West will have the courage of their convictions, regardless of administrative pressure, and defeat this ungodly and unholy measure.

Very respectfully yours,

MILO RENO. President.

AMENDING AN A. A. A. ASSAULT UPON THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. President, pertinent to the consideration of H. R. 8492—the proposed amendment of the A. A. A. enactment now before the Senate—I ask permission to publish in connection with my remarks thereon two wires from Milo Reno and John Bosch, of the National Farmers' Holiday Association, and a number of press articles revealing important country-wide court developments precipitated by this bill. These articles are largely Associated Press and United Press dispatches appearing in the Washington Post and Star and the New York Times and Herald Tribune.

The attempt of this bill to legalize processing-tax levies and collections even if, as we find on page 33, line 15, "finally held invalid by reason of any provision in the Constitution", and to declare such tax levies lawful, as we find in page 33, lines 16 to 20, even if "finally held invalid by reason of the Secretary of Agriculture's exercise or failure to exercise any power conferred on him", has started a host of suits in Federal courts in all the States where food products are milled or processed and in something like 50 leading cities where grain, livestock, or textile products are manufactured.

In my own city of Minneapolis week before last six restraining orders were granted in United States District Court by Judge Molyneaux against collection of processing taxes, the industries affected including flour milling, sundry cereal foods, and newsprint. Something like $2,000,000 of processing-tax collections are tied up in court.

In Chicago, twoscore small packers joined an uprising of textile manufacturers and millers seeking injunctions to be heard in the Federal courts on Monday. They seek both to bar the July 1 collections, and also ask for rebates on past payments held to be illegal under the recent N. R. A. decision in the "sick chicken" case.

Similar cases have arisen in the Federal courts at Indianapolis; New York; Louisville; Salina, Kans.; Philadelphia; Rochester, N. Y.; St. Paul, Minn.; Davenport, Iowa; likewise Dubuque and Fort Dodge, and several in St. Louis and Kansas City. In Sherman, Tex., a temporary restraining order has been granted against collection of tax in a wheat-milling case. In San Francisco cases have been filed by packing companies. In Washington, D. C., the American Newspaper Publishers Association seeks "compensating taxes" on imported newsprint.

There is nothing surprising in this sudden flood of new cases against the A. A. A. to anyone who has carefully read the 53 printed pages of this bill, and especially those provisions which seek to invade the judiciary powers of the United States and declare lawful the provisions held by the Court to be unconstitutional, and to legalize the Executive acts held by the Court to be illegal.

In addition to the hundred or more pending cases brought by the textile industries of the North and South Atlantic States, we may see during this or the coming week several hundred new cases, which the pending bill, which should be entitled "A bill to annul the judiciary powers of the United States and deprive citizens of the rights guaranteed in the fifth and tenth amendments, including the right of due process of law", has inspired throughout the agricultural and industrial States wherever a factory offers the farm a home market.

The original A. A. A. measure raised enough questions of constitutionality. Besides the question of invading the intrastate commerce of the State and seeking to control local industries, such as the farms, mills, warehouses, and stores—in other words, the issued settled in the N. R. A. decision—the A. A. A. raised the even greater issue of a bureau exercising both the tax power of levying and collecting process taxes and the disbursement power by distributing the collected revenues to other producers.

This amendatory A. A. A. bill raises at least two more questions of constitutionality. First, it seeks to invade article III of the Constitution, which provides:

> The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

The bill provides that the processing tax shall be legal, and that refunds of illegal taxes may not be recovered by due process of law, notwithstanding the fact that the taxes shall be "finally held invalid by reason of any provision of the Constitution."

It defies the courts, it seeks to annul the rights of citizens for a day in court, and it defies the Constitution itself. It seeks to set up the racketeers of the A. A. A. as superior to the judiciary power of the land.

This bill asks Congress to legalize illegal acts and ignore article V of the Bill of Rights if these illegal acts are committed by the Secretary of Agriculture and his A. A. A. dictatorship. And the victims of the illegal acts are to be deprived of a hearing in court. The Secretary of Agriculture in this bill seeks not only the legislative power of levying taxes and the executive authority to collect and disburse taxes but a superjudiciary power to set aside the powers and jurisdiction which the courts of America have exercised for 146 years.

Consistently the bill should go one step further and give Wallace and his A. A. A. crowd of deputy sheriffs a jail and hangman's noose and a central office off in some safe mountain district, where the gold hoard of Washington, nearly half the gold of the world, is about to be stored under military guard against citizen raids, and after chaos, riots, and revolution have been put down it ought to come in handy to cement the dictatorship of F. D. R. (Fabian-deal Roosevelt).

In order to popularize this high-handed measure a pretense is made of cooperation with "State and local committees" and "to permit cooperative associations of producers." But please read this section of the bill closely, and see if there is anything there but a paternalistic pretense. Read this language on page 46, line 24:

(b) (1) The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to establish, for the more effective administration of the functions vested in him by this title, State and local committees or associations of producers, and to permit cooperative associations of producers, when in his judgment they are qualified to do so, to act as agents of their members and patrons in connection with the distribution of payments authorized to be made under section 8.

In other words, cooperative associations have no initial powers whatever. All they are allowed to do is to act as messengers in the "distribution of payments" if and when in Wallace's "judgment they are qualified to do so."

All that amounts to is this: Wallace's Pullman-car crowd of paid politicians will get the job of passing out the checks which Wallace sends out from Washington. No genuine cooperative associations of local origin, independent of Washington, have any powers under this bill. He will name the "State and local committees." He will permit them to distribute checks "when in his judgment they are qualified to do so." And, of course, they will not be "qualified to do so" unless they follow the political orders of James Aloysius Farley. This "cooperative" provision begins and ends with Federal political association, as, indeed, is the whole present design of the A. A. A.

The successive steps of unconstitutionality involved in this bill proceed as follows:

First. The tax power of Congress, which John Marshall termed the "power to destroy", is delegated to the Secretary of Agriculture and his fellow legislators of the A. A. A., who may impose such levy of processing taxes as he in his omniscience may determine.

Second. Having concluded his legislative job of fixing the tax levy, he proceeds with the executive duty of assessment and collection.

Third. He now assumes a second legislative function, namely, the appropriation and allocation of the collected taxes—taking money from Peter to pay Paul—increasing the production costs of every mill and factory that provides a home market for the farm, and finally passes the whole amount of taxes and administrative costs on to the consumer, namely, the wage earners, employed or unemployed, and the 30,000,000 homes.

Fourth. The amended bill before us then seeks to set aside and annul the powers of the courts and deprive citizens of their constitutional rights under the fifth amendment, which provides that no citizen shall be "deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law."

Fifth. The bill likewise ignores the tenth amendment, which provides:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

Sixth. In order to forestall any appeal to the courts to seek justice against unlawful seizure of property and against collection of taxes held to invalidate the Constitution, this bill invades the judiciary powers and the civic rights of the fifth amendment in section 21 of the bill, found on page 44, as follows:

SEC. 21. (a) No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or on any counterclaim for, any amount of any tax assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment. Except pursuant to a final judgment or decree entered prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, no recoupment, set-off, refund, or credit of, or counterclaim for, any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be made or allowed.

This section, if not an ex post facto law per se, and therefore prohibited by the Constitution, is so near the line that it may help to swell the mass of cases now springing up like mushrooms all over the United States against the high-handed provisions of a measure that has no counterpart in the history of republican government.

Section 21 then proceeds through subsections (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), and (g) for five pages of doubtful constitutionality, and winds up with a penalty provision providing that "any false statement" in securing a "refund of any tax" shall be punishable "by a fine of not more than $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 6 months, or both."

The judge of the false statement regarding the amount of tax due is the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Then comes this interesting limitation upon the functions of the Comptroller General of the United States, apparently prohibiting the Comptroller from reviewing the fact of the payment of the tax. I refer to pages 48 and 49:

Any other provision of the law notwithstanding, the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed, without review of the fact of the payment of tax, to certify for payment refunds authorized under this subsection in the amounts scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Thus the heads of two executive offices, the Secretary of Agriculture and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are made supreme in their combined legislative and judicial powers. Levy and collection of taxes, the finding of guilt of "false statement" in securing refund of tax, and the fine of $1,000 and 6 months' imprisonment follow their decisions. And no suits can be brought to show the illegality of their official acts. Hitler, Mussolini, or Stalin could not write a bill more to his taste than this.

The advance "whitewash" of all illegal acts—which may logically be termed the "permanent immunity" paragraph—is found in section 21 (c), which reads as follows:

(c) The taxes imposed under this title, as determined, prescribed, proclaimed, and made effective by the proclamations and certificates of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President and by the regulations of the Secretary with the approval of the President prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment, are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes (together with penalties and interest with respect thereto) prior to said date are hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if each such tax had been made effective and the rate thereof fixed specifically by prior act of Congress. All such taxes which have accrued and remain unpaid on the date of the adoption of this amendment shall be assessed and collected pursuant to section 19, and to the provisions of law made applicable thereby. Nothing in this section shall be construed to import illegality to any act, determination, proclamation, certificate, or regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President done or made prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment.

A large amount of space could be saved if this section were reduced to the following six words:

The king can do no wrong.

It is here made unlawful for the court to construe illegality to any unconstitutional or illegal act of the Secretary of Agriculture or the President. Other acts of Congress stand the gantlet of court review, but the taxation power of the new deal's "King John" is so far above that surrendered by his British predecessor at Runnymede in 1215 that no court shall construe to the contrary, and it shall be unlawful for any victim to plead the fifth amendment in demanding due process of law in defense of liberty and property.

The Senate will do well to put a quietus upon this proposal of autocratic tyranny before the country is torn up with strikes and riots, "holiday" raids, martial law, and impeachment trials. The President proposes to double the ranks of his C. C. C. shock troops, although last year the C. C. C. cost $100,000,000 more than the Regular Army. With the expanded 600,000 of the C. C. C., the sheriffs of the A. A. A., and the Army and training-camp Reserves, all told, together with such State militias as he may be able to muster, he will have a combined military force practically equal to that of Mussolini or Hitler—but he will need them all if such bills as this are foisted upon the American people by usurpation of the legislative power of Congress, by annulment of the judicial power of the courts, and defiance of the rights alike of the States and of their citizens under the Constitution.

These $880,000,000 of processing taxes, levied by the A. A. A. bureau by an unconstitutional delegation of legislative power to the President, have so thoroughly destroyed the ability of American farms and manufacturers of agricultural products to compete with like industries abroad that this country is now, for the first time in history, flooded with imports of all foreign products having an agricultural content.

During the first quarter of this year alone, as reported on Saturday, June 29, by the United States Chamber of Commerce, agricultural imports, including manufactured foodstuffs, reached the maximum figure of $496,000,000, or at the rate of nearly $2,000,000,000 of imports annually in a country whose exports of agricultural products once totaled $3,000,000,000.

Imports of grain and meat and dairy products exceeded exports in all the staple articles which once developed the 12 States of the Middle West. Under the A. A. A. we have squandered over $1,000,000,000 of public funds to help drought, weeds, dust, bugs, and disease destroy the greatest agricultural empire on the globe. We have reversed the aims of a century to make two blades of grain grow where one grew before, and helped disaster grow one blade where two grew before.

By unconstitutional delegation of the legislative power of Congress, a "Step-and-fetch-it" Congress has delivered the tax power to an executive bureau to levy a tax burden of $880,000,000, which has "cracked down" the greatest market on the globe—the American home market, to which every country on earth, unburdened with processing taxes, looks with glee, while our own once independent and self-reliant farm yeomen are living like serfs on the doles of their feudal lord in Washington.

There can be no national recovery unless and until, first, we repeal the processing taxes; second, permit industry its freedom from political domination; third, restore the guarantees of our Constitution to the 128,000,000 Americans of our 48 sovereign constituencies—that "indissoluble Union of indestructible States", which until this new deal was known as the American Republic.

This bill in itself is a confession, first, that the A. A. A. is invalid and a violation of the Constitution; second, that the acts of the Secretary of Agriculture and his A. A. A. "shock troops" are illegal; third, that the taxes levied and collected by them cannot look a judge in the face.

Otherwise, why section 21 (a), providing that "No suit or proceeding shall be brought or maintained in, nor shall any judgment or decree be entered by, any court for the recoupment, set-off, or refund" of taxes levied by the Secretary of Agriculture and/or the President?

Why section 21 (c), providing that all taxes imposed hitherto by the Secretary of Agriculture and/or the President are "hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed"? Lawfully collected taxes need no such whitewash immunity.

Why is it made a crime to construe illegality to "any act, determination, proclamation, certificate, or regulation of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President done or made prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment"? Never before have the courts of the United States been debarred from reviewing the legality of the acts of public servants. If Federal activities under the A. A. A. are lawful, they need no law to prohibit their review by the courts.

Why is the Comptroller General of the United States "directed" to certify payment of amounts scheduled to him by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, "without review of the fact of the payment of the tax"?

The Comptroller General of the United States is an officer of Congress. It is his lawful duty to "review the facts" of tax-refund payments. That was one of the chief functions of the office—to check the financial operations of the Executive departments to see that they conformed with the law. This attempted prohibition upon the freedom of the Comptroller General is in itself an admission that the acts of the executive bureaus in the levy and collection of processing taxes will not stand public scrutiny. We have here a "planned" alibi and immunity set up in advance of the fiscal crime.

This bill affords the best proof yet advanced to warrant the indictment that the purpose of the new deal is to legalize unlawful acts; to impose upon the country by force of ballyhoo and subsidy foreign policies abhorrent to our Constitution; to substitute a Federal autocracy for a Republic; to substitute "government of men" for what Tugwell calls the "fiction" of "government of laws."

If we are true to our oaths to uphold the Constitution, if we would not see in this country what we have seen happen under Mussolini, Hitler, and Stalin in Europe—the abolition of the Constitution and Bill of Rights—we shall vote to kill this bill.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the newspaper items and editorials to which I referred in my speech be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The newspaper articles and telegrams are as follows:

SMALL PACKERS JOIN FIGHT ON A. A. A. TAXES—NEARLY 40 MINOR FIRMS SUE TO BAR FURTHER PAYMENTS; SOME ASK REFUNDS

CHICAGO, June 29.—The "Big Four" held to the sidelines tonight as nearly twoscore smaller packing concerns joined an uprising of textile manufacturers and millers against A. A. A. processing taxes.

With the next installment of the collections, from which farmers are paid corn, hog, and cotton benefits, due July 1, several of the injunction proceedings seeking to bar further tax payments were scheduled for hearing in Federal courts over the country on Monday.

Some of the concerns ask a refund of taxes already paid. Government officials have estimated that nearly $900,000,000 in processing taxes have been collected to date.

At Washington Farm Administration authorities scoffed at the triple-headed attack on the taxes and charged rumors of widespread strikes contemplated against their payment were spread by opponents seeking defeat of A. A. A. amendments.

The big Chicago firms of Armour, Wilson, Cudahy, and Swift, which turn in approximately $1,000,000 a month to the A. A. A., took no steps toward withholding any sums due. Swift & Co. announced it "would pay all processing taxes due at the end of June for which extensions have not been granted."

Firms which have begun actions included Kingan & Co., of Indianapolis; Adolph Goebel, New York; Louisville Provisions Co., Louisville; Butzer Packing Co., Salina, Kans.; F. G. Vogt & Sons, Philadelphia; the Rochester Packing Co., Rochester; J. R. McMillan Co., St. Paul; Kohrs Packing Co., Davenport, Iowa; the American, Heil, Krey, and Laclede packing companies, of St. Louis; J. H. Belz Provisions Co., St. Louis; Dubuque Packing Co., Dubuque, Iowa; and Tobin Packing Co., Fort Dodge, Iowa.

MILLERS GET INJUNCTIONS

MINNEAPOLIS, June 29.—Six temporary restraining orders were granted in United States district court today by Judge Joseph W. Molyneaux against the collection of processing taxes. Five of the temporary orders were obtained by milling companies and the other by a paper company. They tied up taxes to have been paid to the collector of internal revenue today amounting to approximately $1,327,728.

The restraining orders were granted by Judge Molyneaux to Gold Medal Foods, Inc., a subsidiary to General Mills, Inc., which was to have paid $17,862.92; International Milling Co., with a payment of $269,814.20; King Midas Milling Co., $100,301.46; Russell-Miller Milling Co., $165,832.67; Pillsbury Flour Mills Co., $768,101.65; and the Harvey Paper Mills Co., $5,816.04.

Hearings were set for 10 a. m., July 8, when arguments will be heard on the requests for temporary injunctions. In practically all of the requests for relief against the processing taxes, violations of the Constitution were claimed.

MILLIONS INVOLVED IN LEGALITY CONTEST—UNITED STATES CLAIMS LAW PREVENTS EFFORT TO STOP PAYMENTS UNTIL SUPREME COURT TEST

CHICAGO, June 29.—Packers and millers joined cotton manufacturers today in a rebellion against the processing taxes of the administration's Agricultural Adjustment Act.

A survey showed some 35 packing houses had filed petitions for injunctions to restrain collection of the hog processing tax with the next installment, due on July 1.

General Mills, Inc., with headquarters in Minneapolis, joined the attack by filing a similar suit in Buffalo, N. Y., seeking to restrain collection of the Federal wheat-processing tax.

The packers were reluctant to discuss the suits, but it was explained that they are intended to lift the tax until the Supreme Court rules on the validity of the A. A. A. Privately, attorneys for the Chicago packers have been predicting a defeat for A. A. A. since the Court's N. R. A. ruling.

HEARING DUE MONDAY

Many of the injunction proceedings are scheduled for hearing Monday, and a victory for the processors would tie up taxes totaling hundreds of thousands of dollars, although the big Chicago packers, who pay $250,000 a week, do not figure in the fight.

Among the bigger packing firms which have taken the taxes to court are Kingan & Co., of Indianapolis; Adolf Gobel, New York; Louisville Provision Co., Louisville, Ky.; Butzer Packing Co., Salina, Kans.; F. G. Vogt & Son, Philadelphia; and the Rochester Packing Co., Rochester, N. Y.

Also asking injunctions to halt collection of the processing taxes are three Iowa firms—the Tobin Packing Co., Fort Dodge; the Kohrs Packing Co., Davenport; and the Dubuque Packing Co., Dubuque.

In the St. Louis area alone suits on file would tie up collections of more than $1,000,000. Firms seeking injunctions include Heil Packing Co., Krey Packing Co., Laclede Packing Co., J. H. Belz Provision Co., and the American Packing Co.

DENY TAX RESTRAINT POSSIBLE

The Government has answered the St. Louis suits with the claim that Federal statutes prohibit the maintenance in any court of a suit to restrain the collection of Federal taxes. A similar answer has been filed to a suit by the Scala Packing Co., Utica, N. Y., over $17,702 in processing taxes.

The Chicago packers generally said they would pay the July 1 installment and await developments in the court fight.

Cotton processing taxes are under fire in a $2,500,000 action filed by the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., seeking to recover taxes already paid.

The packers' suits do not seek recovery, it was explained, since to win would subject the houses to a flood of similar suits for farmers and consumers.

Washington offices of the A. A. A., the Justice Department, and the Internal Revenue Department said a complete list of suits filed and money involved was not available.

A. A. A. WINS ROUND

The A. A. A. tax program, however, has already won an initial victory in the tax fight. This came when Federal Judge Albert L. Reeves, of Kansas City, recently dismissed a petition of the Larabee Flour Mills protesting the processing tax and asking an injunction restraining collection of the wheat processing tax. At the same time the court refused to rule on the constitutionality of the A. A. A. program.

But another Federal judge, Judge William H. Atwell, at Kansas City last Wednesday granted a temporary injunction to the G. R. Smith Milling Co., of Sherman, Tex., restraining the Government from collecting the Federal processing tax on wheat in the Kansas City district.

The milling company attacked the tax on the grounds it violated the fifth and tenth amendments to the Constitution. The case will be tried September 19 on its merits. The company posted $125,000 bond to guarantee payment of the tax if it is proved to be legal.

OVER $496,000,000 FARM PRODUCTS IMPORTED—UNPRECEDENTED FIGURE FOR FIRST QUARTER OF THIS YEAR REPORTED BY CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Unprecedented importations of agricultural products during the first quarter of this year were reported today by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

An analysis issued by the organization said import trade for the quarter was the heaviest in 4 years, value of the goods moving inward amounting to $496,000,000.

Heavy imports of materials for industry and some agricultural products attracted to the United States by drought needs and high internal prices were described as "prime factors" in the increase.

FOOD INDUSTRY ALLOWED WRITS IN WAR ON A. A. A.—TEMPORARY RESTRAINT PUT ON PROCESS TAX BY UNITED STATES COURT IN WEST

CHICAGO, June 29.—The Nation's food industry, striking as if by prearranged signal, revolted in the courts today against the new deal's A. A. A. processing taxes from which huge benefits are paid to farmers.

The revolt, which began brewing after the Supreme Court's invalidation of N. R. A., threatened the nucleus of the administration's agricultural recovery program.

General Mills, Inc., largest milling company in the world, and four other concerns obtained temporary restraining orders in Federal court at Minneapolis against further collection of the A. A. A.'s processing taxes.

Other suits will be filed in scattered parts of the country, it was announced.

The packing industry was reported mobilizing for a Nation-wide campaign against the tax on meat packing which pays to the Government benefits given stock raisers. Several scattered injunctions against this division of the tax already have been granted.

Companies in addition to General Mills making application for temporary writs were Pillsbury Flour Mills Co., Russell Miller Milling Co., International Milling Co., and King Midas Mills Co.

In adjoining St. Paul the J. T. McMillian Co. filed a petition in Federal court asking an injunction against further collection of the processing tax on pork.

At Des Moines a joint suit by two meat packers challenging constitutionality of the hog-processing taxes was filed in Federal court by the Korhs Packing Co., of Dubuque, Iowa, and the Davenport (Iowa) Packing Co.

All the suits charged that the tax was unconstitutional because it levied taxes on one class of citizens for the benefit of another. Many lawyers have argued since the Supreme Court's N. R. A. ruling that the A. A. A. is equally illegal.

The first of the General Mills' many subsidiaries to file suit for an injunction was the Washburn Crosby Co. at Buffalo. More than a dozen other similar actions followed in quick order.

A significant gesture toward the Treasury's staff of hard-boiled tax collectors was the reply of Farm Administration officials to talk of a general strike against processing-tax payments.

A. A. A. spokesmen said processing taxes were in the same classification as all other Federal taxes, and that willful failure to pay would make the processors liable for heavy penalties.

But it was reported that many processors have applied to the Government for postponement of payment, hoping to see the tax declared invalid by the Supreme Court.

Under the A. A. A. Act, the Secretary of the Treasury may grant postponements of processing-tax payment for 180 days.

The office of Secretary of Agriculture Wallace announced officially that no reports have been received of a wholesale failure to pay the disputed tax or of any general strike against payment.

A. A. A. BILL MODIFIED TO AVOID N. R. A. FATE—SENATE GROUP REVISES AMENDMENTS FOR CONSTITUTIONAL SAFETY AND TO AVERT TAX SUITS—EXPORT SUBSIDY DROPPED—MEASURE DROPS MANY HOUSE PROVISIONS—WRITS HALT $2,000,000 COLLECTIONS

WASHINGTON, June 29.—Revised in an effort to meet possible constitutional objections and carrying a provision designed to block suits to recover processing taxes, the A. A. A. amendments bill today was ordered favorably reported by the Senate Agriculture Committee.

This new-deal measure to give Secretary Wallace broad authority to "order" controlled marketing under growers-processors' agreements is slated for Senate action next week.

Withdrawn hurriedly from Senate consideration when the Supreme Court's N. R. A. decision was handed down, the measure was rewritten, passed by the House, and revised again by the Senate group.

"The feature of the bill, which I believe reconciles it to the decision of the Court in the N. R. A. case, is that all its provisions are made to apply only in reference to interstate commerce", Chairman SMITH, Democrat, of South Carolina, said. "Their effectiveness in intrastate affairs is made possible only by the cooperation of the States in providing the necessary laws and machinery and government to carry on in the State the control provisions the Federal Government has in interstate commerce."

Recently scores of processors have filed suits against the Government for recovery of millions paid in processing taxes. As revised, the measure provides that no suits may be filed against the Government for any operation of the law up to the time of the passage of the amendment bill.

It also is designed to shut out suits for any amounts claimed by some growers to have been collected in excess of parity prices the measure seeks to establish.

Chairman SMITH said the limitation was justified because it was evident that in such cases the tax would already have been passed on to the consumer or deducted from the price paid the grower and that there would be no justice to such suits filed by processors.

As a limitation on any further excess processing taxes, the committee amended the bill to provide that when any farm commodity under the tax schedule is brought up to parity, or near parity, the tax may be reduced or abolished. Its restoration would be permitted only in the event the price sagged. Heretofore the tax has been fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture, subject to little change.

The committee attached a "compensatory tax" on "rayon and all fiber that in physical quality competes with cotton." An extra 25-percent levy was attached, Mr. SMITH explained, because a pound of rayon compared in its cloth-producing ability with more than a pound of cotton.

Provisions permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to use 30 percent of the Nation's customs receipts in financing export of surplus farm commodities and giving regional groups of citrus growers the power to pull out of any control agreement, were stricken out by the committee.

EXPORT PLAN HELD A PERIL

At one time a supporter of the customs receipts export subsidy provision, Mr. SMITH said the committee had been convinced it would work to the detriment of American farmers and processors, particularly in the case of cotton.

"That," he said, "would be inviting disaster."

The citrus-fruit amendment originally was attached at the insistence of Senator FLETCHER, Democrat, of Florida, because some Florida growers objected to quota restrictions sought by California and Rio Grande growers.

Fruits intended for canning were exempted by the bill as passed by the House but restored by the Senate committee. Added also to the list of "controllable" crops were poultry and eggs, wool and mohair. The latter two had been deleted by the House.

Other provisions of the revised bill include:

1. To authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to order marketing agreements for handlers of milk, tobacco, fresh fruits (except apples), fresh vegetables (except those for canning), soy beans, walnuts, pecans, hops, poultry, eggs, wool, and mohair provided 50 percent by volume of the handlers in a given class or region agree with it or if two-thirds of the farmers desire it. Milk is subject also to price fixing and milk retailers to "orders."

2. To permit crop control to move up or down, rather than merely downward as under the present A. A. A. Act.

3. To permit the President to fix quotas or compensating taxes on imports he finds are depressing domestic farm products below the determined "parity prices."

WOULD EXTEND SUGAR QUOTAS

4. To extend the Jones-Costigan Sugar Quota Act from May 9, 1937, to December 31, 1937, and to extend the Bankhead Cotton Control Act and the Smith-Kerr Tobacco Control Act through another crop year.

5. To permit refunds of taxes paid on floor stocks in event the processing tax is dropped.

6. To authorize the Secretary to maintain an ever normal granary by buying up surpluses in bumper years and redistributing to the farmers in lieu of benefit payments in lean years.

7. To promote State cooperation in carrying out for intrastate commerce what is intended by the Federal act for interstate commerce.

To meet complaints that some of the cooperative marketing organizations were merely private merchandising arrangements, the bill was amended to provide that Government loans would be extended to such groups only where 50 percent of the commodity they handled was provided by its members.

PRESS AMENDMENTS ABSENT

WASHINGTON, June 29.—Absent from the draft of the A. A. A. amendments bill, as approved by the Senate committee today, were the freedom-of-the-press amendments proposed by the American Newspaper Publishers' Association, which would have prevented the levying of any compensating taxes on imported newsprint and provided that nothing in the A. A. A. amendments was to be construed as carrying authority to regulate advertising.

Called a "compromise" by some agricultural officials, the Senate tax provisions are calculated to bring about an almost immediate reduction in levies on tobacco and a curtailment of that on hogs and other basic commodities later.

Meanwhile Seth Thomas, counsel of the A. A. A., in a statement late today advised processors that it was unnecessary for them all to rush into court with suits against the A. A. A. to safeguard their legal rights. Chester Davis, A. A. A. Administrator, said he was giving wide publicity to the opinion, since many honest manufacturers undoubtedly feared they would lose out if they did not file suit.

Under the new bill a processing tax of 30 cents a bushel would become effective August 1 on rye, together with taxes of 35 cents a bushel on flaxseed and 25 cents a bushel on barley.

CHANGE IN HOG-CORN PROVISION

Among the several House bill provisions stricken out by the Senate group was one which would have included permission to treat hogs and field corn as one commodity, so that tax collections on pork processing might be used to make benefit payments on corn-production control. Another deleted provision would have required that benefit payments for each commodity be not less than the processing taxes levied thereon.

The new processing tax formula adopted in the Senate committee would provide that when prevailing farm prices surpassed parity prices by 20 percent the processing tax would be at the rate of 20 percent of the parity level. Should the prevailing price go to more than 20 percent above parity the processing tax would be cut to 10 percent. Parity prices are defined as the difference between the current exchange value of such commodities and those prevailing from 1909 to 1914.

The Nation-wide court tests on the legality of the processing taxes, based partly upon charges of an unwarranted delegation to the Secretary of Agriculture of legislative power, indicate a bitter controversy when the new amendments are taken up in the Senate.

An extended controversy between the Senate and House conferees also was foreseen by some observers today as the result of the deletion of important provisions insisted upon by the House Agricultural Committee.

BIG MILLERS WIN TEMPORARY WRITS

CHICAGO, June 29.—A series of temporary orders restraining collection of nearly $2,000,000 in processing taxes tonight marked a new development in the battle of big millers, textile, and packing concerns to overturn the A. A. A.

Temporary injunctions issued by Federal Judge Joseph W. Molyneaux at Minneapolis at the request of five large milling firms and one paper concern, prevented collection of nearly $1,500,000 and set the site for one of the leading assaults on the statute for that jurisdiction.

The Federal revenue collector for Oklahoma likewise was temporarily restrained against collecting wheat-processing taxes on petition of three milling and elevator firms at Oklahoma City.

The Minneapolis actions were brought by Gold Medal Foods, Inc., a subsidiary of General Mills, Inc.; International Milling Co.; Russell-Miller Milling; King Midas Milling Co.; Pillsbury Flour Mills Co.; and the Harvey Paper Mill Co. They charged generally that the taxes were unconstitutional, and hearings were set for July 8.

The Pillsbury petition said it owed $768,101.65 in taxes, the largest single amount involved.

In a score of other jurisdictions, suits by nearly twoscore packing firms as well as by other millers and textile manufacturers were pending. The "Big Four" Chicago packers, however, were on the sidelines in the fight.

NEXT INSTALLMENT DUE JULY 1

With the next installment of the collections, from which farmers receive corn-hog and cotton benefits, due July 1, several of the injunction proceedings seeking to bar further tax payments were scheduled for hearing in Federal courts over the country Monday.

Some of the concerns ask a refund of taxes already paid. Government officials have estimated that nearly $900,000,000 in processing taxes have been collected to date.

The big Chicago firms of Armour, Wilson, Cudahy, and Swift, which turn in approximately $1,000,000 a month to the A. A. A., took no steps toward withholding any sums due.

Swift & Co. announced it "will pay all processing taxes due at the end of June for which extensions have not been granted."

For the suing packers, it was said unofficially in trade quarters here that the petition of the Rothblum Packing Co., filed in San Francisco yesterday, probably summarized the general stand.

The Farm Administration won one action brought by the Larabee Flour Mills when the Federal court at Kansas City dismissed the company's petition for an injunction, but lost a later action before another Federal judge. The second judge granted the Smith Milling Co., of Sherman, Tex., a temporary order against collection of the wheat-processing tax in that district.

DES MOINES IOWA, July 1, 1935.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL:

Triple A amendments increase Secretary's power as agricultural dictator and should be defeated. The proposal to protect the Government from paying back what it has unconstitutionally obtained, through processing taxes, is most reprehensible. The millions of dollars taken from the farmer who refused to sign a contract that made of him a slave is entitled to recover.

MILO RENO.

ST. PAUL, MINN., July 2, 1935.

Senator SCHALL,

Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Minnesota Farmers Holiday Association opposed to A. A. A. amendments. Particularly the attempt to deprive farmers who refused to sign A. A. A. contracts of constitutional right to recover losses as result of processing tax.

JOHN H. BOSCH.

HURLEY BERATES ADMINISTRATION ON SUBTERFUGE—TELLS G. O. P. GROUP "ATTACK ON CONSTITUTION IS SIGNIFICANT"

CHICAGO, July 10.—The Democratic Party was accused today by Patrick J. Hurley, Secretary of War under President Hoover, of attempting to change the Constitution by subterfuge and of repudiating both its 1932 platform and the preelection promises of President Roosevelt.

In a speech prepared for delivery to a Republican meeting at the Hamilton Club, Hurley declared, "when we do come out of the depression it will not be because of the new-deal policies, but because the new-deal policies have been defeated.

He called upon the Republican Party to lead the revolt of the people against coercion, and said the final defense of the Constitution must be made at the polls.

"The attack of the new deal upon the Constitution is significant", he said. "Certainly it would be easier for a dictator to govern America under a collectivist form of government than under a democracy. * * *

"The attempt to centralize the Government and make it the master of the people has not been completely stopped by the decisions of the Supreme Court. The same Machiavellian language is still being used in the preamble of every act of Congress introduced by the 'new dealers' for the purpose of circumventing the Constitution, while appearing to operate under it.

"The Constitution should not be changed by subterfuge. If it is to be changed, the people have a right to consider the proposed changes and to approve or reject them."

Touching on Democratic promises, Hurley said, "The Democratic Party has repudiated the preelection declarations of its leader, the President. It has repudiated that statesman-like document known as the 'Chicago platform.' What promises can the Democratic Party now make to the people that can reasonably be believed and relied upon by the people?"

Hurley declared that, counter to promises, the new deal "created the greatest bureaucracy in the history of this Republic, created the most stupendous debt in the history of our Nation, and created the greatest deficit our Government has ever had."

Mr. DICKINSON obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Illinois to yield in order that I may offer an amendment to the pending bill.

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. I tender an amendment to the pending bill with the understanding with the Chairman of the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in charge of the bill, that the amendment shall lie upon the table for the time being, or be placed in the bill at such point as may be wholly convenient in the arrangement of the proposed legislation. The amendment I tender, if I may be pardoned to intrude further upon the time of the Senator from Iowa, is to cover the production of cotton in Illinois. I may say that the subject of the amendment was accidentally omitted to be presented for consideration by the committee in making up the bill. I have submitted the amendment to the chairman of the committee, and he understands its purpose. I now tender the amendment, which has already been considered in connection with the House measure and has already passed in the House. I ask that this amendment be placed in the bill at such convenient point as will not disturb the harmony of the committee's program in connection with the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I have looked over this amendment and I think it is very pertinent. So far as I am concerned, as chairman of the committee, I should like to have it added at the proper place, or as an independent section, because I think it ought to be in the law.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment being tendered, but I object to it being inserted in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask what the amendment relates to?

Mr. KING. The production of cotton in Illinois.

Mr. COPELAND. We do not raise any cotton in New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table for future action.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] has made reference to the sections of the bill which I desire to discuss for just a few moments. I refer first to section 32, on page 57 of the bill. I read the language beginning on top of page 58:

> No Federal or State court shall have jurisdiction to entertain a suit or proceeding against the United States or any collector of internal revenue or other internal-revenue officer or any person who has been such a collector or officer or the personal representative of any such collector—

And so forth. I now read from a provision found on page 59, subparagraph (b), as follows:

> (b) No suit, action, or proceeding (including probate, administration, receivership, and bankruptcy proceedings) shall be brought or maintained in any court if such suit, action, or proceeding is for the purpose or has the effect (1) of preventing or restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed or the amount of any penalty or interest accrued under this title on or after the date of the adoption of this amendment, or (2) of obtaining a declaratory judgment under the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act—

And so forth. On the next page is subparagraph (c), which provides that all acts of the Secretary of Agriculture—

> Are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes (together with penalties and interest with respect thereto) prior to said date are hereby legalized and ratified and confirmed—

And so forth.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Is all this material new to this bill? Is there nothing in the present law which is in accord with the provisions referred?

Mr. DICKINSON. Absolutely nothing. This is a new amendment. The report says:

> Section 32 also proposes to add a new subsection, 21 (d).

That adds to the original act a new section, 21 (d), which prohibits the bringing of suits for refund or credit of any taxes paid under the act prior to the adoption of the amendment or for damage on account of their collection.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator, does that mean that the courts are closed to citizens of the United States who might have a claim otherwise?

Mr. DICKINSON. That means that we are proposing to adopt a policy whereby provisions of that kind are going to be imposed upon the individuals and the business interests of this country; and on top of that, if an unlawful, an unconstitutional, act has been committed, affecting any individual, that act is legalized, and, therefore, there is no recourse to the courts. We might just as well abolish the Department of Justice and close the courts, so far as the Agricultural Adjustment Act is concerned, if this provision goes into the law.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a statement there, since he has raised the question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In case the Supreme Court should declare the processing tax unconstitutional, does the Senator think, if a processor who paid the tax and either subtracted it from the price paid to the producer or added it to the price for which he sold the commodity to the consumer, that, in equity, the processor should be entitled to recover a tax which he, himself, has already passed on to the numerous individuals who have either bought the commodity, on the one hand, or have sold the raw material, on the other hand?

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me say that it is my belief that there has been a deliberate effort on the part of the present administration to prevent much of this unconstitutional legislation ever reaching the Supreme Court for a delayed length of time. That being the case, there was no way by which a man who had this tax imposed upon him could really find out what his remedy was. Therefore he had to run the risk; and he has run the risk.

I am not so much interested in that phase of it as I am in the phase of it under the provision of subsection (b) which provides that an individual who has a processing tax imposed upon his business cannot go into court and ask for an order restraining the collection of that tax, and that all taxes are legalized, including penalties, interest, and so forth.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Yes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from South Carolina is addressing himself to the physical fact of what shall become of the taxes which have been collected in the event the law should be declared to be unconstitutional, and there might be a very practical question involved as to who should be the ultimate beneficiary of a collected unconstitutional tax. But I ask the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from South Carolina, even though it is contemplated to take care of that situation, where is the justification for saying in plain language under clause (2), on page 59, that a citizen shall not even be permitted to use the Federal Declaratory Judgments Act to find out whether or not his rights have been invaded and the law is unconstitutional? That is a totally different question.

Mr. SMITH. I would much prefer to leave such questions to some of those here who are more familiar with the processes of the courts and of the manner of redress; but I understand the provision to which the Senator refers is in strict accordance with the law.

I am fully aware of the fact that there may be a question of the constitutionality of this tax. I, for one, have always opposed it, not on the ground of its constitutionality alone but for other seasons. However, it must be manifest to every Senator that the tax has been in operation for nearly 2 years, the amount collected has been used under the provisions of the law, and the processor has not been prohibited either from taking it out of the commodity he bought by lowering its price or by adding the tax to the price for which he sold it after it was processed.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is the Senator going to proceed to make a bad matter worse by trying to leave in the statute something which will involve the fundamental right of a citizen of the United States not only as to paying this tax but which will bar the court from having a determination whether he had to pay it or not, and, in addition, provide that what has been done to him is going to be legalized and he cannot complain about it?

Mr. SMITH. I think, Mr. President, in justice to all parties, that this provision takes care of the equities of the case, because it provides, where a tax has been paid upon a floor stock or a surplus stock still in the hands of the processor, which he has not passed on to the consumer or otherwise, that he may recover if the tax is declared to be unconstitutional.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me ask the Senator who is going to be the loser? The Government has already collected the money and has paid it to the producer. If the Government now should have to pay it back, who would stand the loss? Poor old Uncle Sam—the taxpayer.

Mr. SMITH. To whom is the Government going to pay it if it has to pay it back?

Mr. DICKINSON. To the man who paid the tax.

Mr. SMITH. How are we going to find that man if the processor has manufactured the goods and distributed them to the thousands of people who bought the processed goods? By what process are we going to refund it? The producer has got it. The object of the tax was to bring up the purchasing power of the producer's commodity as near parity as may be. In good faith the Government collected the tax and distributed it product for product in benefit payments. That was the very object of the original law.

Mr. DICKINSON. May I ask the Senator how under subsection (b) one can get into court? That section debars the individual from going into court.

Mr. SMITH. That is only in reference to future taxes; it has nothing to do with this.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. What troubles me is whether or not the very fundamental idea of Anglo-Saxon jurisprudence is denied. I have read them only hastily and therefore I venture no dogmatic opinion concerning them, but do these sections deny the right of access to the courts of the land on the part of citizens who complain that they have been injured by some specific action under this bill?

Mr. SMITH. Only in reference to the recovery of taxes already imposed. The provision runs up to and is contemporaneous with the passage of this proposed act as affecting the taxes heretofore collected. As to them the courts shall be denied to those who might want to seek a judgment or to have a rebate apportioned.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that, in the language of the bill, the prohibition is effective in respect to taxes "on and after the date of the adoption of this amendment."

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

My attention has been called to the fact that the Senator is now quoting from subparagraph (b) which has reference to future taxes. An individual may sue after the passage of this act, and if he can show damage done he may recover, but the prohibition against the court action only refers to the tax that has already been collected and has already been passed into the different channels for which it was levied.

Mr. DICKINSON. No such interpretation can be read into the wording of the bill, for the reason that it provides—

> No suit, action, or proceeding * * * shall be brought or maintained in any court if such suit, action, or proceeding is for the purpose or has the effect (1) of preventing or restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed.

That is plain English.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If a layman were applying his logic to the provision it would be the same as having it read:

> No suit, action, or proceeding * * * shall be brought or maintained in any court if such suit, action, or proceeding is for the purpose of preventing the court from sending a man to jail for murder.

It is exactly the same thing. To me it is unthinkable that an American citizen shall be denied the right to go into court.

Mr. SMITH. He is not denied the right to go into court. I am not familiar with the terminology of the law, but, as explained to the committee, and as the lawyers here should readily see, the citizen is prohibited from seeking injunctions and declaratory judgments, but he has every other opportunity to go into court and to have his case adjudicated.

Mr. DICKINSON. If I am faced with the payment of an unconstitutional tax, the very thing I want is the right to go into court and secure an order enjoining the officer of the law from collecting the tax against me.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wish to understand what this provision of the bill really does. As I understand—and if I am mistaken, I wish to be corrected—under this bill, if it should be enacted, an individual could not have the right to sue to test the constitutionality of the tax, and could not bring suit to recover an illegal tax.

Mr. SMITH. He could sue for a refund.

Mr. BORAH. Well, could he?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; as to future taxes.

Mr. BORAH. Could he sue as to future taxes?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BORAH. If that be true, let us suppose that in the past a man has paid $10,000 in taxes, which are found to have been illegally levied and collected, this provision denies him the right to recover, although it should be determined that the tax was illegal.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; up to the time of the passage of this measure on the ground——

Mr. BORAH. I understand the ground. The ground is that he has likely passed it on.

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. I think that is sound. The argument for that proposition is the only argument I can conceive of against giving these people a full right to go into court.

Mr. SMITH. I think that is the only argument.

Mr. BORAH. That perhaps can be remedied by providing that in case of action being brought, the Government shall be permitted to show that the party bringing the action has passed the tax on or has not paid the tax.

Mr. SMITH. My attention has been called to another point, which I think the Senator will appreciate. It may be possible for such a system of bookkeeping to be resorted to by certain individuals as to make it appear that they have not passed the tax on when perhaps they really have done so.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, such matters would have to be dealt with in the lawsuit, and there would be a question whether or not the proof was available. I venture to say that if the Government were permitted to show in advance that the tax had been passed on, the doubt would always be resolved in favor of the Government rather than in favor of the individual. That has been my experience in lawsuits with the Government. It would be very rare indeed that the individual would receive the benefit of the doubt.

It seems to me there is a very fundamental question involved, and that is whether or not we are going to incorporate into our system of legislation a denial of the right of the citizen to go fully and freely into the courts to test the legality of any action of the Government, and, if anything has been done wrongfully, accord him the remedy to which he is entitled.

We are faced with the proposition, of course, that the king can do no wrong, and therefore the Government should not be sued. That is the point we have to reach pretty soon in determining these matters, because we are extending this principle in all directions. Certainly if it be true that the principle that the sovereign may not be sued without his consent has been embodied in our jurisprudence, nevertheless that consent ought very rarely to be denied. There ought to be very rare occasions when the citizen should be denied the right to go into court and litigate the wrong, even if the Government is charged with the wrong.

Mr. SMITH. I heartily agree with the Senator from Idaho, and, were it not for the peculiar circumstances surrounding this individual proposition and the complications which may arise, I should insist along with him that the Government be made to show whether or not the tax has been passed on. But it is establishing a precedent for us to enact such legislation, though it is wholly within our power to do it. The question for us to determine is whether it is better for us to close this matter up to the time of the passage of the bill after the taxes have been collected and distributed, or whether it would be better for us to open the way for endless litigation and leave the Department uncertain as to whether or not the amounts which they have collected are to be refunded or what portion of them is to be refunded, and what they may hope to do in carrying on a work which seems to be meeting the approbation of the agricultural population.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest to the Senator from South Carolina, in view of the fact that he is speaking in my time, that lines 12 to 14, page 58, provide:

> Any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty, assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment or for damages for the collection thereof.

It is impossible for the Senator from South Carolina to read the meaning of those lines into paragraph (b) on page 59. If that be the case we must absolutely restate the proposal.

Mr. SMITH. One relates to a time prior to the date of the passage of the bill, and the other to a time "on and after" the date of its passage. That is the difference.

Mr. DICKINSON. But paragraph (b) is not bound by the dates mentioned in paragraph (a), and none of the young draftsmen can read it in there.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will turn to page 59 he will see, beginning in line 10, that it reads as follows:

> Of preventing or restraining the assessment or collection of any tax imposed or the amount of any penalty or interest accrued under this title on and after the date of the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. That means absolutely that we are going to bar the individual from going into court, even after the amendment shall be adopted, to obtain an order enjoining the collection of the tax.

Mr. SMITH. Yes; but he can sue for relief.

Mr. DICKINSON. There can be no suit for relief. The tax is legalized and validated in paragraph (b).

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. Certainly.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Even in paragraph (b) the first two words are "no suit." It provides that—

> No suit * * * shall be brought or maintained.

No suit of any kind or nature whatsoever. Every right of legal recovery is barred.

Mr. DICKINSON. I cannot understand how the Government can ever justify enacting unconstitutional legislation and imposing it upon the public for a matter of 2 years, collecting money which belongs to the people who paid it, and then say that under no circumstances can they get it back; that they cannot bring a suit for injunction to enjoin its collection, and that the whole transaction is legalized and made valid, and therefore the Government can be just as crooked as it wants to be, and as American citizens we have to like it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. As I read the phraseology, there is another proposition involved. Not only is suit barred on the question of constitutionality or of fact, but malfeasance and misfeasance in office are protected under this provision. I think, as the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] well stated, the fundamental question involved is not the amount of the taxes which are paid or which may be refunded, but whether we are going to establish practically as a permanent policy that the citizen may not go into court and have his rights adjudicated even when those rights run against the contention of the Government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to submit a question to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] as well as the chairman of the committee [Mr. SMITH]. I have had in mind the idea of submitting an amendment of this character, and I did suggest it to the Committee on Banking and Currency this morning in connection with the resolution forbidding suits against the Government for damages resulting from the repeal of the gold clause—an amendment providing that where a taxpayer alleges that actual damages or actual losses have been suffered, and makes proof thereof, in that case he shall be entitled to recover. That would obviate the objection suggested by the Senator from South Carolina. Where the tax has been passed on to the consumer there would be no recovery, but where the taxpayer has suffered the loss himself and has not passed it on, he would be entitled to recover.

I noticed a tobacco case in New York the other day where the taxpayer paid more than $200,000 processing tax, and his sales had not equalled the amount of the tax. It was self-evident that he had not been able to pass the tax along to the consumer. The report said he was in danger of insolvency or bankruptcy. He certainly ought to have his day in court to prove his damages or loss in the event the processing tax should be adjudged to be an unconstitutional and void tax. I think that he has a right, an indefeasible right, to have the question as to the constitutionality of the tax heard and determined.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, let me say that there has been handed to me a decision of the Supreme Court touching the question of injunction, relating to a section of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

> No suit for the purpose of restraining the assessment or collection of any tax shall be maintained in any court.

That is now the law of the land. Therefore, the remedy for the individual would be to sue for a refund where he could make it appear that the tax had been collected illegally; but he could not restrain the tax collector or enjoin him. That is now the law.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield further?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. GORE. In a recent case, the Board of Trade case—Hill v. Wallace (259 U. S.)—the court held that that section did not prevent or prohibit an injunction in a case involving the "extraordinary and exceptional" circumstances presented in that particular case, where a constitutional question was involved, and where the injunction would obviate a multiplicity of suits. That case was entertained in spite of that section, and a part of that act was held to be invalid.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Of course, there has always been a sound principle of law that the collection of taxes should not be restrained by injunction. Otherwise, the operations of the Government might be entirely stopped; and within the limited sphere in which that principle has been permitted to operate, so far as I am concerned, I should have no objection to it here. What I am contending, however, is that, if I read this section correctly, after the citizen has been denied an injunction, he is denied the right to go into court to recover.

Mr. SMITH. No; not as to any future transaction.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Since this question is now before the Senate, I should like to make inquiry to ascertain if my understanding of the bill is correct.

As I read the bill, so far as any taxes are concerned which were assessed, paid, or collected prior to the adoption of the pending amendment, they are entirely cut off. There is no remedy. As I read the bill further, that is true, irrespective of whether such taxes were paid under an unconstitutional law or because of misfeasance or malfeasance of the officers levying them. I direct attention to the language on page 58 as it relates to taxes already paid. The taxpayer is given no remedy whatsoever for—

> Any amount of any tax, interest, or penalty assessed, paid, collected, or accrued under this title.

Even if there had been a double tax payment, due to willful fraud or to mistake, the taxpayer is left wholly without remedy in any court and under any circumstances.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow me, if he will read further down on the same page, page 58, he will see that the bill provides:

> The provisions of this subsection shall not apply to (1) any overpayment of tax which results from an error in the computation of the tax, or (2) duplicate payments of any tax, or (3) any refund or credit under subsection (a) or (c) of section 15, under paragraph (1) of subsection (e) of section 16, or under section 17 of this title, or (4) any refund or credit to the processor of any tax paid by him with respect to articles exported pursuant to the provisions of section 317 of the Tariff Act of 1930.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; but that takes care only of cases where the tax has been doubled merely by mistake.

Mr. SMITH. Or by an error in computation.

Mr. GEORGE. Or by an error; yes.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. WAGNER. I may be mistaken—I had nothing to do with the drafting of this provision—but I assume its purpose is to prevent the refund of taxes in the event the law should be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. SMITH. That is exactly the purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. I suppose the theory is that, since the processor probably has passed on to the consumer the amount of tax which he paid, he would be recovering a sum that he really did not pay, but which the consumer paid.

Mr. SMITH. That is it.

Mr. WAGNER. Whether or not that is a sound theory I do not know.

Mr. GEORGE. I grant that that is the purpose of the provision, but this language is broader than that. I assert that this language would cut off a suit because of willful fraud or because of actual malfeasance on the part of an officer of the Government in a case where a tax had been imposed and collected. Nothing in the world is taken care of here but a mere error or duplication of tax.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I take it that all of us are trying our best to formulate some law by which agriculture may be taken care of. We do not wish to punish other people when we are doing that; and if, as the Senator from Georgia contends, we should unwittingly be protecting malfeasance or dishonesty, why can we not amend this part of the bill and provide that it shall not exclude a suit based upon rascality in carrying out the law, or whatever the case may be? WeW are not prohibited from doing that.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me reply to the Senator. There is only one remedy which I think can be applied here, and that is to adopt the amendment which I understand the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is going to offer, namely, to strike out section 32.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield—I do not wish to take the Senator off his feet—I am trying to understand the section. I would now, in my place in the Senate, repudiate the idea that the American farmer demands any dishonest legislation for his legitimate protection.

Mr. SMITH. That is the very point I am now making. If the attention of those who drafted this section was not called to the possibility that language was left out which would bring to justice someone who had been guilty of a crime, let us amend the section, so that he can be brought to justice; but let us not go back and, under the form of suits for recovery, permit somebody to have the tax paid back to him after he has passed it on, or deducted it from others.

Mr. GEORGE and Mr. WAGNER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I merely wish to ascertain what the bill means. I am now directing attention to the language which applies to taxes already paid, assessed, accrued, or collected. I again assert that this language is not appropriate to the exclusion of a remedy in the courts merely because the law itself under which it was collected has been declared to be unconstitutional, but it is a legislative ratification of everything that may have been done under that act, although it may have been done in positive violation of the original act. I assert that that is a dishonest suggestion to Congress. I do not charge the committee with it, of course; but it is dishonest. It is essentially dishonest.

Mr. President, I have called attention to that matter because if an appropriate amendment should not be offered by some other Senator I should like to offer it. I can very well understand that, with respect to taxes which have been passed on to the consumer, it may be properly determined by the Congress that there should be no recovery whatsoever. I also concede that where the tax has been collected under a law which it was within the power of the Congress to enact, although there may have been some unlawful delegation of authority or failure to comply with some technical requirement, the Congress may cut off all remedy, that is, with respect to taxes already paid. But this language is far broader than that. While I do not care to indulge in any argument about the matter, I am confident that if, under the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, the power did not exist in the Congress to levy and collect the tax, this whole provision, of course, is void; but if the power resided in the Congress to levy and collect the tax under the original Agricultural Adjustment Act, then, because of any failure of the Congress constitutionally to exercise the power, the Congress may cut off recovery.

So that finally and at last the question which must be presented to the courts with respect to these taxes, whether or not they are passed on to the consumer, is whether the power really existed in the Congress to levy and collect the processing taxes under the Agricultural Adjustment Act. If so, the failure of Congress constitutionally to exercise the power may and can, of course, become the basis of this provision of the bill, and this provision of the bill would be held to be constitutional.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. DICKINSON. I do.

Mr. WAGNER. I should like to ask a question. I do not wish, by my statement a moment ago, to defend this particular provision, because—and that is what I was about to ask the Senator—is there not an injustice involved? We know that in a number of cases the processor himself was compelled to absorb the tax. He was not able to pass it on to the consumer. In those cases we are really doing him a grave injustice, because he has paid a tax which the Government did not have a right to exact, and, at the same time, he has no remedy to recover the tax.

Mr. GEORGE. I think the Senator is correct.

With respect to the taxes to be imposed under this measure, and collected on and after its passage, I can well understand, and I can appreciate the necessity for an enactment by the Congress restraining actions in the courts directed against the collector of internal revenue, or against other officers of the Government; and I can appreciate the necessity of restricting the taxpayer to his legal remedy rather than to the broader equitable remedy, in the interest of maintaining and operating and carrying on the orderly processes of government. I think it would be far wiser to permit a direct attack upon the constitutionality of the act, and in the long run it would be much more in keeping with our theories of the law and of justice, going beyond mere technical law—the fundamental theories upon which we have generally predicated our course of action as a people.

I find here that there is a provision with reference to all future taxes—that is, taxes paid under this amendatory bill—for the recovery of the tax, the burden being thrown upon the taxpayer to show that he had not passed on the tax, or that he had not covered up the tax in the price for which he sold his goods. I rose, however, to call attention to the fact that particularly, with respect to the taxes already paid, the language was far broader than the necessities or justice would seem to justify, because it is not restricted and confined to outlawing the claim to the tax or the refund in the event only that the law under which it was collected or paid is declared unconstitutional, but it goes much further than that.

As the distinguished Senator from New York has well said, while the great bulk of the processing taxes has undoubtedly been passed on, in that event there could be no moral justification for their recovery by the taxpayer. Therefore, in my judgment, no legal remedy should be afforded. But in many instances the processing taxes were not passed on, they were actually absorbed by the processors, sometimes voluntarily, and sometimes involuntarily, because the sales could not be made at the market price plus the additional expenses attached.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Georgia that in many instances concerns were compelled to absorb the processing tax, and did absorb it, when it practically put them in the red, and in an insolvent condition. Yet if this measure should be enacted into law in the shape in which it now is, any such concern or citizen would have absolutely no remedy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. So far as the provision relating to injunctions against Federal taxes is concerned, I would say it ought to be in the bill. I do not think we ought to stop the processes of the Government by enjoining the collection of taxes, and ordinarily that is the principle to which we have adhered. But I do think that the right to recover the tax in case it is illegally levied ought to be open and free to the citizen, whether it be a future tax or a past tax.

So far as the man who has passed on the tax is concerned, that can be taken care of by a provision in the bill, and it ought to be taken care of. Of course, if a man has passed on the tax, he ought not to be permitted to recover it, and I believe that without any provision of the statute at all he would be denied the right to recover it, if that fact were shown. But that could be included in the statute by providing an efficient injunctive process, and also providing for the defense on the part of the Government that the tax has been passed on. After that it seems to me we ought to leave the matter open and free for the citizen to test the question. I do not believe the nonsuability of the Government should be innovated in full. I do not think that principle has any sound basis under constitutional government. I recognize that the principle has become imbedded in our system of jurisprudence and that consent must be given, but I am in favor of giving the consent.

The Senator from Georgia has made a distinction which I think is entirely sound, that if the power existed but the method of using it was wrong, that would be a different proposition from the condition when there is no power existing. But the right to test whether or not the power does exist ought to be open to be determined, and the citizen ought not to be embarrassed or impeded in his right to test that question. The very foundation principle of free government is that there is a remedy for every wrong.

Mr. DICKINSON. Let me suggest to the Senator from Idaho that subsection (c) validates the entire transaction. Let me read the first provision of subsection (c), on page 60:

> The taxes imposed under this title, as determined, prescribed, proclaimed, and made effective by the proclamations and certificates of the Secretary of Agriculture or of the President and by the regulations of the Secretary with the approval of the President prior to the date of the adoption of this amendment are hereby legalized and ratified, and the assessment, levy, collection, and accrual of all such taxes (together with penalties and interest with respect thereto) prior to said date are hereby legalized.

In other words, it would not make any difference if there were fraud involved in the collection of the tax, it would not make any difference what the conditions were, the citizen would be barred from any remedy.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that raises another question—a very serious constitutional question which I think the friends of the measure would desire to avoid. Can the Government take property from a person illegally and then by process of law provide that it was taken legally or deny the citizen the right to test the question of whether it was taken legally? Would not that be taking property without due process of law? It is the very essence of tyranny to collect taxes illegally and then deny the citizen the right to test the question of whether they were taken legally.

Mr. DICKINSON. Is it not true that the Government took the gold, and is going to give it back when it wants to, and denies the citizen the right to make any claim of his loss?

Mr. BORAH. Of course, the gold contract raises the same question we are now discussing.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. Perhaps those in charge of the bill would accept an amendment simply providing that the burden should be on the taxpayer to show that he did not pass the tax on.

Mr. BORAH. I should think they would accept such an amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. I think that would be a fair provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this discussion has proceeded on the theory that the matter being debated is pending before the Senate. It is simply brought to the floor of the Senate by the speech of the Senator from Iowa; it is not in the pending measure. Therefore I think it is unfortunate at this time to talk about a proposed revision of this section. Doubtless when we get to it the whole section will be gone over again.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa yield to me?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, I recognize that the Senator from Iowa had the right to take the floor and speak; but I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that we have reached a certain point in the committee amendments, on page 71, and when the Senator shall have concluded, unless some other Senator shall desire to discuss the question, I should prefer, if the Senate will permit, to finish the consideration of the Senate committee amendments, and then the bill will be open for presentation of amendments on the floor of the Senate, and we can also take up the amendments which have been passed over.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from South Carolina that it is not my desire to delay the consideration of the committee amendments, but I think that Senators ought to be thinking about some of the phases of the provisions of the bill to which I am referring. Therefore I think it is well to have them advanced at an early date so that we can think them over a little.

I now desire to read a short suggestion which I received this morning, a quotation from the Daily Record, of Baltimore, Md. I read:

[From the Daily Record, Baltimore, Md., July 11, 1935]

LETTER TO THE EDITOR ON THE A. A. A. BILL—ABOLISHING LEGAL REMEDIES DANGEROUS TO LIBERTY

The proposal in the new A. A. A. bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, to destroy the taxpayers' legal remedy for the recovery of an illegally levied processing tax, is a very dangerous proceeding. Such proposal should be defeated in the Senate.

Woodrow Wilson had something to say on that subject as follows:

"A man is not free through representative assemblies, he is free in his own action, in his own dealings with the persons and powers about him, or he is not free at all. There is no such thing as corporate liberty. Liberty belongs to the individual, or it does not exist.

"And so the instrumentalities through which individuals are afforded protection against the injustice or the unwarranted exactions of government are central to the whole structure of a constitutional system. From the very outset in modern constitutional history until now it has invariably been recognized as one of the essentials of constitutional government that the individual should be provided with some tribunal to which he could resort with the confident expectation that he should find justice there, not only justice as against other individuals who have disregarded his rights or sought to disregard them but also justice against the Government itself, a perfect protection against all violations of law. Constitutional government is par excellence a government of law." (Constitutional Government in the United States, by Woodrow Wilson, pp. 16, 17.)

See also Prof. Frank J. Goodnow in his Principles of Constitutional Government to the same effect, where he points out that without such judicial remedy, before a judicial tribunal independent of executive control, constitutional government is impossible.

A citizen and taxpayer who is deprived of his day in court (upon whatever ground), and thus prevented from recovering back a tax he has been illegally compelled to pay, lives under a tyranny. He has no rights which the Government is bound to respect. He does not live under a government of law. He has ceased to be a citizen of a free country. It is difficult to distinguish his position from the subject who lives under fascism.

To say, as the bill says, that he cannot recover back an illegal tax unless he can show that the consumer has not paid to him the amount of the illegal levy does not make the proposition fair or just to either taxpayer or consumer.

The only protection the consumer has against the effect of an illegal tax, in increasing the price of the goods he must purchase, is to have the immediate taxpayer contest the illegality of the tax. So that the effect of the proposal is to preserve the tax notwithstanding its illegality, and thus illegally mulct the consumer.

To deprive the taxpayer of his legal remedy unless he can show a business impossibility; that is, that he did not add the amount of the illegal tax to his price to the consumer only aggravates the injury and injustice. It seems to attempt to make two wrongs into a right. It attempts to justify a wrong because the consumer in the end inevitably suffered the wrong.

It says to the taxpayer, we intend to levy money illegally from you unless you are so virtuous that you refuse to collect the illegal amounts from the consumer. In other words, you must protect the consumer from the illegal effect of the Government's action in levying an illegal tax on you if you expect to recover back the illegal tax.

The business effect of that unfair proposal is to successfully enforce the collection of illegal taxtion.

MEMBER OF THE BALTIMORE BAR.

Mr. President, this tax question is going much further than any other phases of what we call the "new deal."

In support of the amendment to strike out section 32 of this bill, I desire to draw the Senate's attention to a special phase of this great question, which not only appears to have escaped proper examination and scrutiny but casts an ever more threatening shadow toward the future. In five momentous decisions the Supreme Court recently has passed upon the delegation of power which Congress can make to the Executive. It has gone to great lengths to point out that by merely declaring an "emergency" no additional powers can be conferred upon the Federal Government. It has also affirmed that, no matter what the circumstances, there can be no abdication or surrender of legislative authority into the hands of the President without specific direction as to its use.

These are principles inherent in and inalienable from our system of constitutional government. They have won the admiration of the world because, even more than any bill of rights, they constitute practical safeguards for liberty itself. Never throughout the 150 years of our history has this separation of legislative and executive power been a partisan issue; on the contrary, it has been supported unanimously by all parties and by all shades of political opinion. Nor do I need to remind my Democratic colleagues who have so zealously defended that other ark of our liberties—State rights—that maintaining the integrity of Congress against encroachment by the executive branch always has been regarded as a special obligation which rested upon the disciples of Thomas Jefferson.

Yet since the Schechter decision was handed down the Senate has considered and passed the social-security bill and the Wagner industrial-disputes measure. It will soon vote upon the Guffey coal-control bill, amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and other items on the administration's "must" program. In these bills, as in the original new-deal acts of last year, there rises, like Banquo's ghost, that same broad, underlying question of delegation of power. Many distinguished constitutional lawyers have already laid before the Senate their views upholding the position taken by the Court. Notwithstanding the hasty reconsideration that has been given these measures by both Senate and House committees, misgiving and doubt still persist as to their constitutionality.

ATTEMPTS AT NATIONAL REGIMENTATION

In redefining that control over business, for example, asked by the Secretary of Agriculture under the A. A. A. amendments, it is difficult to see how substituting the word "order" for the word "license" can change the actual authority that it is intended to convey. No matter what the phraseology or the new disguise, the attempt at national regimentation will not down. It will not down because such regimentation is the basic philosophy of the new deal itself. All these measures aim at the same purpose: The conferring of more and more power upon the Executive; yet, by adroitly playing upon words, to conceal or avoid that very limitation which the courts have declared to be inseparable from a grant by Congress. The tenuousness of this authority has been recognized by the administration itself. Let me quote from a recent speech on the social-security bill made by Audrey Williams, second in command of the Federal Emergency Relief Administration:

In the light of the recent unfortunate experience with the N. R. A. great doubt arises as to whether the Federal Government has authority to establish a national system of unemployment compensation, however desirable that may be. There is no constitutional basis for such action except the taxing power and the welfare clause. The latter has never been regarded by the Supreme Court as conferring any powers on the Congress not granted specifically; and the former, while broad, cannot be employed where the Court deems the tax a mere subterfuge for unauthorized regulation.

During the hearings before the House committee on that bill, many witnesses questioned whether Congress could legislate on such sweeping lines; but without effect. For when the bill emerged, the form remained substantially the same as had been received from the White House. In passing let me note that under its provisions taxes are to be laid upon all industry and all workers which by 1950 will total $1,700,000,000 annually, or nearly the entire taxable corporate income for all business reported last year. Yet when the actuarial basis for such a comprehensive program was under review, only one witness who could be qualified as an expert was heard by the House committee.

Similarly, when the Railroad Retirement Act was passed by Congress last year, it contained a clause making retroactive charges on the carriers totaling $3,000,000,000. To the merest legal neophyte it would seem obvious that such a provision was almost certainly unconstitutional, and so the courts declared it.

Questions of this character, relating to these measures which the Senate has just passed, have been raised here repeatedly by Senators who are experts on the Constitution. I profoundly respect their judgment. Yet the majority lightly passes over and disregards these considered opinions. By this acquiescence another statute is sent on its way toward almost certain judicial disapproval.

Now I am concerned over the consequences likely to flow from this failure on the part of Congress to discharge fully its own duties. This neglect in examining carefully into the constitutionality of laws enacted so light-heartedly in itself sets up a strain on the Constitution that was never contemplated. Under the unusual circumstances that have prevailed, this point has been overlooked, I fear, on both sides of this Chamber by many who have been reared in what is now regarded in some circles as an old-fashioned reverence for that charter of liberty. Let us be honest and candidly face the facts.

"PASSING THE BUCK" TO THE COURTS

From an examination of these cases, cannot the inference be drawn that Congress has sought, as if deliberately, to hide behind the courts? that, rather than assume responsibility for economic policies in which it did not believe, it adopted the more expedient course of giving the President what he demanded and then "passed the buck", placing upon the judiciary the burden of disapproval? or that, lacking courage to oppose those who had suborned the Democratic Party's solemn platform pledges, Congress itself sought to evade its plain duty in the preparation of legislation?

When the Schechter decision was announced the audible relief of the majority Membership in Congress was plainly evident through comment in the press. They did not share the President's views that abolition for N. R. A. meant economic retrogression, or a return to any "horse and buggy" era. What was more important to them was the fact that, at one stroke, the accumulated political liabilities gathered during the first year of General Johnson's "blue buzzard", had been wiped out. But we must not permit the popularity of that verdict to mislead us in considering its possible consequences.

Let us assume for a moment that, in those equally vital cases which have not yet been passed upon by the Supreme Court, the administration should lose. Let us examine the possibilities that may arise should the T. V. A. be denied its announced function as a "yardstick" for the electric-power industry; should the processing taxes, which Secretary Wallace has set up as "internal tariffs" to equalize price levels between agriculture and industry, be declared invalid as restricting commerce between the States; should the Wagner industrial disputes or the social-security measures be held unconstitutional exercises of Federal power.

In such an eventuality the new deal is at once stripped of the political nostrums through which, like hypodermic injections, it sought to restore the Nation's economic health. The pretense of a planned economy, which, by bureaucratic license, seeks to regulate all economic activity, must then be abandoned. A situation arises without parallel in American history. With the experiment of regimentation revealed to the public for what it really is—a disastrous and monumental failure—the issue is joined between utopian dreams and the actuality of economic law. Faced with such facts, how is the administration to justify itself to the people?

USING THE COURTS TO "ALIBI" THE NEW DEAL FAILURES

Now, the implications from such a contingency—from an unprecedented impasse between the executive and judicial branches of the Government—would be grave enough under any circumstances. How much more serious must they be when the administration, so challenged, is seeking reelection? When it asks, as it must, public ratification either on its record, or by alibi-ing that record?

Is not the strain placed upon the Constitution, to which unintentionally and carelessly Congress has contributed, plainly evident? The Supreme Court is to be dragged into politics, not because it has performed its sworn duty in saying "no" to hastily conceived and imperfectly drawn legislation but because it is charged with having thwarted the public will. It must be made the scapegoat to hide administrative incompetency. Nor can the Court defend or explain its own acts; it can speak only in the decisions it hands down. It must remain aloof from political battles which may be decisive for the Nation's whole future.

The dangers to the Republic from any such distorted controversy cannot be minimized. They rise above partisanship; they must be repelled by all believers in constitutional government. No one has painted a more realistic picture of what might happen under these circumstances than Gen. Hugh Johnson. Because of his intimacy with those who now guide our national destinies, his comment on the issue that is raised must receive careful attention. Let me quote the general:

A drama is being enacted. The possible catastrophe is the eventual complete destruction of the new deal by the Court, piece by piece. The conclusion will then scream so that all will understand, and it cannot even be debated: "No progressive legislation will be permitted by the Court. Humanity is being crucified on the cross of a reactionary reading of the Constitution of the United States."

Now, this points to revolution. There are more kinds of revolution than one, and blood is not necessary in all of them. * * * When the conclusion toward which events are rushing in the courts becomes plain to everybody—that the Court holds that our Constitution, as it is, prevents social legislation—then an overwhelming popular demand for a radical change in either the Court or the Constitution is as sure as sunrise.

Now that is bad. It is bad because it is pointing up right now to a crisis in a Presidential election. That means bigotry, bitterness, and the red fires and sirens of hot emotion. It means a struggle over something far deeper than the issues of any ordinary campaign. On the one side, people who have any property, much or little, will be made to think they are fighting for all they have. On the other side, people who have been hurt and battered by the depression will be convinced that they are being exploited and enslaved; that "the interests" have taken control even of the courts—in other words, that they are fighting for very freedom against tyranny and oppression.

These are the seeds of civil war. That is a very heavy responsibility on the leaders of both extremes in the controversy. It should cause them to pause and consider. It is a terrific responsibility for the Court, which is being placed between the fires of two extremes on the hottest spot it has ever occupied.

Hasty and equivocal legislation ought not to be rushed. Die-hard resistance to every reasonable and necessary reform in our old do-nothing policies ought to be tempered to the conditions under which we live. The Court would do well to start all over on the basis of the Constitution itself and forget its tangle of interpretations, "judge-made words," and constitutional bypaths onto which some of its opinions have fallen.

REAL ISSUES BEFORE THE PEOPLE

Such is General Johnson's estimate of the situation that we face. It is not a pleasant picture. "A struggle over something far deeper than the issues of an ordinary campaign", says the general. In that diagnosis I agree. But the issue is not between the "haves and have nots", as Federal Relief Administrator Hopkins is reported to have declared.

I cannot conceive of the American people dividing on the proposition of envying one another's goods or engaged in pulling down each other's houses. The real issue is whether as a Nation we have lost our resourcefulness and courage and, in the psychology of despair, embraced a near communism, with Government doles exchanged for those things our forefathers held to be more precious than life itself. I cannot believe that a Nation, born in a struggle for high principles and which has never hesitated to sacrifice blood and treasure in upholding those principles, will now accept regimentation modeled on Hitlerism, its citizenship reduced to the status of robots, blindly goose-stepping to commissars enthroned at Washington.

There is another phase to this question which also requires examination. I turn to it reluctantly because I find it difficult for myself to impugn the motives of the President of the United States. I have long felt, as Members of this body well know, that responsibility for the new deal's errors must be laid where it belongs—on the doorstep of the White House itself. I have not subscribed to the doctrine that, right or wrong, Mr. Roosevelt should be followed blindly and that criticism should be suppressed. That seemed to me a false kind of patriotism, one calculated to raise exactly such issues as now confront us. But I have not been willing to believe that the President would deliberately set out to attack, through the instrumentality of the Supreme Court, the very Constitution that he has sworn to uphold.

Yet one cannot ignore obvious facts or the deductions which must inevitably arise from them. The facts I have cited. The deduction from them is supplied by the distinguished political commentator and historian, Mr. Mark Sullivan. Recently Mr. Sullivan wrote, and it was widely published throughout the United States:

Congress has passed, or is in process of passing, several measures which are widely believed to be unconstitutional, either as a whole or vital parts of them. These measures are pressed on Congress by the President. If Mr. Roosevelt did not press them, Congress would not enact them or would not enact them until after taking the unconstitutional features out of them. President Roosevelt will not permit that. The parts of the measures he insists on are the parts that most plainly raise the doubt about constitutionality.

Mr. Roosevelt is described as pounding his fist on his desk to Democratic leaders of Congress. Some of these leaders are well known to hold private views differing from what they do under Mr. Roosevelt's demand. To get some of the measures through leaders have been obliged to adopt the device of avoiding a roll call, because individual Democrats are unwilling to go on record as favoring the measures. The labor-disputes bill and the A. A. A. measures were adopted by viva voce vote—that is, without a roll call.

One question thus presented is the propriety of a President insisting on passage of measures whose constitutionality is seriously doubted, or which some of those who confer with him tell him are unconstitutional. Another is the question of Democratic leaders insisting on passage of legislation which privately they believe to be unconstitutional. President and Members of Congress alike take an oath to support the Constitution. They are supposed to be just as duty bound to support the Constitution as the Supreme Court is.

A more immediate question is, Just what lies in Mr. Roosevelt's mind; what is his motive in insisting on measures that are believed to be unconstitutional, and especially on the particular parts of the measures which are supposed to violate the Constitution most directly?

The motive, it seems tenable to assume, has to do with the political future and with Mr. Roosevelt's opposition to the Supreme Court and the Constitution. Everybody knows that Mr. Roosevelt was profoundly displeased by the decision in which the Supreme Court, by unanimous action, held N. R. A. to be invalid. It is not so generally known, but Mr. Roosevelt had even more reason to be angered by the other decision, in which the Court, also by unanimous action, curtailed Mr. Roosevelt's power to remove at will members of the Federal Trade Commission and similar governmental bodies. That decision made it difficult for the President to impose his will on such bodies as the Federal Trade Commission, the Federal Reserve Board, and the similar bodies. This deprived Mr. Roosevelt of an important power, one that was essential in bringing about the "new economic order" which Mr. Roosevelt said was his purpose.

A common assumption about Mr. Roosevelt's recent actions is that he has privately dedicated himself to overcoming the handicaps which the Supreme Court decisions have put upon him. Almost certainly this is his purpose, and he is strongly determined to bring it about.

This purpose could be carried out directly. It could be done directly by merely proposing and putting through an amendment changing the Constitution. Or it could be done, also directly, by putting through Congress a measure curtailing the powers of the Supreme Court. It is apparent, however, that Mr. Roosevelt prefers not to do it directly. As was said of Mr. Roosevelt by Mr. Lippmann when Mr. Roosevelt was a candidate for the Presidency and Mr. Lippmann thought less well of him than now, "his purposes are not simple and his methods are not direct."

The common assumption is that Mr. Roosevelt hopes to make the Supreme Court and the Constitution less popular next year than they are now. The Court will be obliged to find unconstitutional the measures now being forced through Congress. Such decisions by the Court can be expected to offend groups of voters. To declare unconstitutional the A. A. A. amendments now being passed would take the cash benefits away from farmers. To declare the labor-disputes bill unconstitutional would offend labor. To declare the Guffey coal bill unconstitutional would likewise offend labor in that industry. To declare anything unconstitutional in the utility holding-companies bill or the Tennessee Valley Authority would offend those who believe in Government ownership and radicals generally. The sum of these groups, offended by decisions handed down by the Supreme Court next year, might give Mr. Roosevelt the support he does not have now, both for his project of changing the Constitution or curtailing the power of the Supreme Court, and also for reelection to the Presidency.

Then Mr. Sullivan adds this conclusion:

However, beneath this assumption about Mr. Roosevelt's motive lie some solid conditions which tend to support the assumption. The new deal cannot go on to fruit except by giving the Government greater power to compel the individual. That means the new deal cannot go on except by depriving the courts of their independence, depriving them of their present function of holding the scales even between the Government and citizen.

Furthermore, the new deal contemplates a centralized government, what in Europe is called a "totalitarian" state. That cannot be in America except by changing the Constitution so as to take away from the 48 States and giving to the Government at Washington many of the powers which the States now possess.

Now those are sober and measured words; they do not spring from hysterical emotion like those of General Johnson's. Yet they must be read together with the general's statement. They must also be read in connection with the President's own criticism of the Supreme Court's N. R. A. decision. They cannot be dismissed as partisan or inconsequential. For it is the essence of statesmanship, not to await or accept the inevitability of events, but to anticipate and seek to forestall them.

DUTIES LAID UPON THE SENATE

When fundamental principles established under the Constitution are involved, as I stated in the beginning, there are no differences between Republicans and Democrats. Interpretations of basic law cannot be made on the basis of current economic theories. Nor can there be any difference of opinion, I believe, as to the duties laid upon the Senate in this connection. We cannot proceed blindly down a road, ignoring all the danger signals that have been set, to end up at last in that catastrophe predicted by Mr. Roosevelt himself when as Governor of New York he said:

It was clear to the framers of our Constitution that the greatest possible liberty of self-government must be given to each State and that any national administration attempting to make all the laws for the whole Nation—

Those are Mr. Roosevelt's own words—

* * * would inevitably result * * * in a dissolution of the Union itself.

Under those constitutional provisions which require concurrence by the Senate in the ratification of foreign treaties and in the appointment of Federal officials—including members of the Supreme Court—by the President, it was the plain intention of the founders that this body should be charged with the special task of jealously watching any aggrandizement of the Executive power. The mere fact that the Supreme Court has already declared invalid delegations of congressional power establishes that we have been negligent in that duty. With such warnings, must we continue to repeat the same mistakes?

Fortunately, it is not yet too late for amends. Much important legislation remains to be acted upon by the Senate. The prospect seems to be that we will be here most of the summer. In the measures that come before us we must redouble our vigilance as to their unconstitutionality. We must not permit a continuance of this unfair burden to lie upon the Supreme Court.

There is only one further phase of this matter to which I wish to call attention for just a moment, and that is that Congress ought not to disregard its duty to consider the constitutionality of legislation. The theory that legislation should be sent here from the other end of the Avenue, that it should be passed, and that we should give no consideration to its constitutionality is a theory which I think cannot be defended.

I read in the Washington Evening Star of yesterday an article by David Lawrence. Mr. Lawrence quoted from a President's letter, as follows:

I hope your committee will not permit doubts as to constitutionality, however reasonable, to block the suggested legislation.

Then David Lawrence writes:

This is tantamount to saying that it doesn't matter whether a bill is plainly unconstitutional, it should be passed anyhow. If this philosophy were followed there would be an end to the Constitution altogether. For if Congress were to ignore Supreme Court decisions and pass laws in conflict with the Constitution, it might conceivably feel it also had the power to suspend certain articles of the Constitution. Congress could, if it chose, refuse to appropriate money to carry on the judicial branch of the Government.

And so forth. In other words, I do not believe Congress ought to shirk its duty to examine the constitutionality of every piece of legislation which comes to the floor of the Senate.

I am glad to see that this bill is being given some real consideration. I was glad to see the interest shown in the suggestions I made with reference to section 32. I believe every Member of the Senate ought to look at these questions from the constitutional standpoint.

In support of what I have been saying, Mr. President, I ask that there be printed at this point in the RECORD an article by Frank L. Peckham, of the bar of the District of Columbia, on the subject, Is the Supreme Court Guilty of "Usurpation"?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

IS THE SUPREME COURT GUILTY OF "USURPATION"?

(By Frank L. Peckham, Bar of the District of Columbia; Joseph H. Choate Chapter, 1907)

The right of the Supreme Court of the United States to set aside acts of Congress as being unconstitutional has been the subject of much able discussion in recent months. There are, however, a few points which might be emphasized as conclusively answering those demagogues and radicals who charge the Supreme Court with "usurpation" of power, because that Court has declared unconstitutional some of their pet measures and more especially because they know that the Court would hold unconstitutional a great number of measures which political mountebanks and incompetent experimenters are desirous of foisting on the people.

"Usurpation" means the forcible seizure of place, power, functions, or the like, without right; to commit unjust encroachments. In other words, it means to take or exercise powers or functions rightfully belonging to others.

The strident-voiced radicals create the impression that the Supreme Court has reached out and assumed without right the power to declare legislative enactments unconstitutional; that it has arrogated to itself a function that was not granted to it, and they seek to terrify the public with the bugaboo of threatened government by the judiciary through gradual extension by the courts of their prerogatives.

It would be well to note, in passing, that the judiciary has been most cautious in the exercise of its right to review legislation and has avoided any tendency to exercise its power improperly, as is evidenced by the fact that among the thousands of cases which have been before the Supreme Court during the 135 years that have elapsed since the adoption of the Constitution, in only 48 cases has that Court held acts of Congress to be unconstitutional.

An examination of the provisions of the Constitution, of the history of its development and enactment, of the statements and acts of men, courts, and legislative bodies before and immediately after its adoption, will show that the right to examine into the constitutionality of legislative acts was granted to the judiciary by the Constitution and was intended to be so granted by the framers of that document.

The Supreme Court was created directly by the Constitution. Section 1 of article III provides distinctly and without conditions or qualifications that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court * * *." As to the creation of that one Court, nothing was left to the discretion of that Legislature. It was ordained and established by the Constitution, while the same section left to the discretion of Congress the creation of inferior courts. Certainly that provision and the provisions regarding tenure of office and compensation of judges show an unequivocal intention that the judiciary should be entirely independent of the legislative and executive branches of the Government.

Section 2 of article III provides that "the judicial power shall extend to all cases * * * arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States * * *." Certainly no judicial function can be exercised by a court without involving the interpretation of the laws applicable to the case under consideration, and it is equally certain that the provisions of the Constitution are applicable to any litigation that possibly could be brought in any court of the United States. In article VI we find the provision, "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law of the land * * *." The framers of the Constitution did not say simply, "The laws of the United States." On the contrary, they qualified the phrase by the requirement that the laws should be made in "pursuance" of the Constitution, not in derogation of it, or contrary to it, or beyond the bounds set by it.

There is ample evidence that the intention expressed in the words of the Constitution squares with the intention of its framers.

Prior to the adoption of the Constitution, and so shortly before its adoption that the circumstances were fresh in the memories of the members of the conventions, at least four State courts in four separate States—New Jersey, Virginia, Rhode Island, and North Carolina—had asserted and exercised the right to set aside legislative acts as being contrary to the constitutions of the States.

In the New Jersey case (Holmes v. Walton, decided in 1780) (see State v. Parkhurst, 9 N. J. L. (4 Hal.) 444; Prof. A. W. Scott's "Holmes v. Walton, the New Jersey Precedent", Rutgers College Pub. No. 8) a State statute providing for a trial by a jury of six persons was held as being in conflict with the State constitution, which provided that "the inestimable right of trial by jury shall remain confirmed as a part of the law of this Colony, without repeal, forever." Complaint was made to the legislature that the court had set aside one of its laws as being unconstitutional. The legislature, instead of attempting to curtail the power of the courts, enacted a new law providing for a jury of 12 persons when demanded by a party to litigation, thus confirming by inference at least the judicial finding.

In the Virginia case (Commonwealth v. Caton, decided in 1782) (4 Call 5) Judge Wythe said: "If the whole legislature—an event to be deprecated—should attempt to overleap the bounds prescribed to them by the people, I, in administering the public justice of the country, will meet the united powers at my seat in this tribunal and, pointing to the Constitution, will say to them, 'Here is the limit of your authority, and hither shall you go, but no further.'"

In the Rhode Island case (Trevett v. Weeden, decided in 1786) (Thayer's Cases on Constitutional Law, vol. 1, p. 73; McMaster's History of U. S., vol. 1, p. 338; Durfee's Judicial History of Rhode Island, pp. 51 et seq.) the court held that a statute of the legislature, providing for the summary conviction of persons declining to receive paper currency, operated to deprive the defendant of the right of trial by jury and, therefore, was void as being contrary to the charter of Rhode Island.

In the North Carolina case (Bayard v. Singleton, decided in 1787) (1 Martin (N. C.) 48; N. C. R., Martin & 2d Haywood's Law & Equity, by Battle, 42) the superior court of the State, in May 1787, declared that a certain act of assembly of 1785 was unconstitutional and not binding upon the court. The court held: "The Constitution (which the judicial power was bound to take notice of as much as of any other law whatsoever) standing in full force as the fundamental law of the land, notwithstanding the act on which the present motion was grounded, the same act must, of course, in that instance stand as abrogated and without effect."

In 1785, in a written address to the Assembly of Pennsylvania, Gouverneur Morris, who later represented Pennsylvania in the Constitutional Convention, commenting upon the action of the court in Holmes v. Walton as negativing any suggestion of unlimited legislative authority, used the expression "the Constitution is no more if it can be changed by the legislature." (Sparks, Life of Gouverneur Morris, vol. 3, p. 438).

These acts of the courts were clearly in the minds of many of the men who participated in the Constitutional Conventions. Some of the delegates had been interested, directly or indirectly, in the litigation. During the debates on the Constitution the right of the judiciary to review legislative enactments was asserted again and again. Gerry, of Massachusetts, stated at one time that the judges could protect the judicial department against encroachment by their exposition of the laws, and said that "judges had actually set aside laws as being against the Constitution, and this was done, too, with general approbation" (Elliott's Debates, 2d ed., vol. V, p. 151). Gouverneur Morris said: "A law that ought to be negatived will be set aside in the judiciary department" (Id., vol V, p. 321).

Luther Martin, of Maryland, said, "As to the constitutionality of laws, that point will come before the judges in their official character; in this character they have a negative on the laws" (Id., vol. V, p. 346). And again, in his report to the Legislature of Maryland, Martin said, "Whether, therefore, any laws or regulations of the Congress, any acts of its President or other officers, are contrary to, or not warranted by, the Constitution, rests only with the judges, who are appointed by Congress, to determine; by whose determinations every State must be bound" (Id., vol. I, p. 380). Other of the delegates made similar assertions. There is every reason to believe that a majority of the delegates assumed that the judiciary would have the right to review legislative enactments unless definitely prohibited by the provisions of the Constitution, and yet they adopted the provisions creating the Supreme Court and neglected to limit its authority.

During the debates in the Virginia convention that valiant champion of the people's liberties, Patrick Henry, said, "* * * Yes, sir; our judges opposed the acts of the legislature. We have this landmark to guide us. They had fortitude to declare that they were the judiciary, and would oppose unconstitutional acts. * * * I take it as the highest encomium on this country that the acts of the legislature, if unconstitutional, are liable to be opposed by the judiciary (Id., vol. III, p. 324).

It is particularly interesting to note the views expressed by Samuel Adams in the Massachusetts convention. Adams was not a lawyer. He had at one time commenced to study law, but gave it up because of his mother's disapproval. He was an ardent rebel. He managed the Boston Tea Party. He was one of the two excepted from Governor Gage's proclamation of pardon as being one whose offenses against the Crown were "of too flagrant a nature to admit of any other consideration than that of condign punishment." He consistently failed in all commercial pursuits and even was unsuccessful as a tax collector. Certainly no one will accuse him of harboring capitalistic sentiments. Yet he accepted as a matter of course the right of judicial review of legislative enactments. During the debate, when Governor Hancock had submitted a proposal or reservation containing practically the substance of the first 10 amendments, Adams said:

"This appears to my mind to be a summary of a bill of rights which gentlemen are anxious to obtain. It removes a doubt which many have entertained respecting the matter, and gives assurance that if any law made by the Federal Government should be extended beyond the power granted by the proposed Constitution and inconsistent with the constitution of this State, it would be an error, and adjudged by the courts of law to be void" (Id., vol. II, p. 131).

Similar evidence of the general assumption on the part of all concerned that the judiciary had the power to review legislative enactments is found in the debates in the other State conventions.

In the Draft of a Constitution, reported to the Federal convention August 6, 1787, by the committee of five, section 3 of article XI (now sec. 2, art. III) read: "The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to all cases arising under laws passed by the Legislature of the United States * * *." This was amended on the floor of the convention to read "the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court shall extend to all cases arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States", etc. (Id., vol. I, pp. 229, 268).

In the committee's draft article VIII read: "The acts of the Legislature of the United States made in pursuance of this Constitution * * * shall be the supreme law * * *." The convention amended that provision so as to make it read: "This Constitution, and the laws of the United States made in pursuance thereof * * * shall be the supreme law * * *." (Id., vol. I, pp. 227, 259).

Other incontrovertible evidence as to the intention of the framers of the Constitution and the general acknowledgment of the authority of the judiciary to review legislative enactments is found in the acts of the Legislatures of Delaware, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and Vermont in response to the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions seeking to annul the alien and sedition acts. (Id., vol. IV, appendix; Cooper American Politics, book II, pp. 3–14.)

In the latter part of 1798, about 10 years after the ratification of the Constitution, the Legislatures of Virginia and Kentucky, being opposed to the alien and sedition acts then recently adopted by Congress, passed resolutions declaring those acts unconstitutional, and inviting the other States to do likewise. These resolutions proceeded upon the theory that the Constitution was a compact between the States and that the States as parties thereto might decide the question of the constitutionality of Federal enactments. In 1799, having considered the Virginia and Kentucky resolutions, the respective legislatures of seven of the other States passed resolutions refusing to join with Virginia and Kentucky on the issue raised and declaring that the Federal courts could decide the constitutionality of Federal statutes. Thus a majority of the Original Thirteen States, through their chosen representatives, expressed their views about 14 years before the Supreme Court, in the case of Marbury v. Madison, first asserted the right of the judiciary to review legislative acts and to declare void such as were contrary to the provisions of the Constitution. It will be interesting to note the expressions used by some of the legislatures in their resolutions.

The Rhode Island resolutions included the following resolve:

"That, in the opinion of this legislature, the second section of the third article of the Constitution of the United States, in these words, to wit, 'The judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the laws of the United States', vests in the Federal courts exclusively and in the Supreme Court ultimately the authority of deciding on the constitutionality of any act or law of the Congress of the United States."

The Legislature of Massachusetts resolved:

"That this legislature are persuaded that the decision of all cases in law and equity arising under the Constitution of the United States, and the construction of all laws made in pursuance thereof, are exclusively vested by the people in the judicial courts of the United States."

The resolutions of the Legislature of New York included the following:

"And whereas the judicial power extends expressly to all cases of law and equity arising under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, whereby the interference of the legislatures of the particular States in those cases is manifestly excluded."

The New Hampshire Legislature resolved:

"That the State legislatures are not the proper tribunals to determine the constitutionality of the laws of the General Government; that the duty of such decision is properly and exclusively confided to the judicial department."

Said the Legislature of Vermont:

"It belongs not to State legislatures to decide on the constitutionality of the laws made by the General Government, this power being exclusively vested in the judiciary courts of the Union."

Evidence on this subject could be cumulated and multiplied, but there is no need to go further. There can be no doubt in the mind of the unbiased student that the Federal judiciary was intended to have and did receive through the Constitution the authority to interpret the Constitution and to review congressional acts and to declare void such as contravene the provisions of the Constitution. Furthermore, the failure of the judiciary to exercise that authority would constitute a cowardly violation of its manifest duty and a breach of the trust reposed in that branch of the Government by the framers of the Constitution and the people of the United States.

"Usurpation" is simply a catchword used by self-seeking politicians, by radical enemies of American institutions, by misguided intellectual weaklings, who inveigh against the judiciary not because it has usurped any powers but because it stands as a bulwark against usurpation by the National Legislature of powers not delegated to it by the Constitution.

Any enactment which is contrary to any provision of the Constitution would constitute an amendment of that document. If the National Legislature is to be the final judge of the constitutionality of its own acts, it is ridiculous to provide any method of amendment save through legislative enactment by a temporary majority of Congress. Even were the constitutionality of an act dependent upon a two-thirds vote of both Houses, the entire Constitution might just as well be repealed.

Restrain the courts from declaring legislative enactments unconstitutional, and there will be left solely to the whim of the Congress the preservation or nullification of those guaranties of liberty so dear to the Anglo-Saxon race and so necessary to the happiness and prosperity of a people.

"An elective despotism was not the Government we fought for", said Thomas Jefferson, "but one which should not only be founded on true free principles, but in which the powers of Government should be so divided and balanced among general bodies of magistracy, so that no one could transcend their legal limits without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. (Jefferson Cyclopedia, p. 392).

With equal certainly can it be said that "legislative despotism", the inevitable result of unrestricted legislative power, has no place in the sort of democracy for which this Nation fought and sacrificed so much in the late war and for the preservation of which our race has struggled from the earliest days of the Republic.

Remove from the Constitution the authority conferred by it on the judiciary to review legislation, and soon the average citizen will have occasion to adopt the words of Patrick Henry, who, as a member of the Virginia ratification convention, protested against what he considered probable oppression by the proposed Federal Government and exclaimed: "Old as I am, it is probable I may yet have the appellation of rebel. I trust that I shall see congressional oppression crushed in embryo. As this Government stands, I despise and abhor it" (Elliott's Debates, 2d ed., vol. III, p. 546).

Without the restraining power of the judiciary, there are no limits to which the legislature might not go. The love of power and the craving for its extension are normal human characteristics. Congress could change the entire form of Government and could make of itself a self-perpetuating body. In one stroke it could nullify all of the principles of the Bill of Rights and violate every guaranty of private liberty. It might by legislation—and there is already ground for sensing a tendency in that direction—wipe out all the rights, prerogatives, and functions of State governments and assert in itself the entire, complete, and exclusive legislative functions of the whole country.

Stifle the courts and revoke their right of interpretation of the Constitution and their power to refuse to enforce, and to prevent the enforcement of legislative acts which violate or transcend the provisions of the Constitution, and, by the proposed changes, make Congress the sole judge of its prerogatives, the final arbiter of its authority, there is no end to which the legislature cannot reach, and there will be no remedy against its impositions save revolution by a people who will have learned too late that protection by force must be resorted to when protection by the courts is no longer available.

Mr. DICKINSON. With these suggestions, I yield the floor to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I should like to take up now the next committee amendment, which begins with line 20 on page 71. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is the author of that amendment; and if there should be any questions concerning it, he will answer them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 71, after line 18, it is proposed to insert the following:

AMENDMENTS TO BANKHEAD COTTON ACT

SEC. 40. (a) Section 2 and the first sentence of section 3 (a) of the act entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved April 21, 1934, as amended, are amended by inserting after the phrase "the crop year 1935–36", wherever such phrase appears, the phrase "or the crop year 1936–37 or the crop year 1937–38."

(b) Section 3 (a) of such act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "In ascertaining the sentiment of the producers with respect to the crop year 1936–37 or the crop year 1937–38, the vote in favor of the compulsory tax features of this act, by two-thirds of the producers voting, shall be deemed sufficient for the purposes of this subsection."

(c) The action of the Secretary of Agriculture in ascertaining and proclaiming, pursuant to section 3 (a) and (b) of such act, as amended, 10,500,000 bales as the maximum amount of cotton of the crop harvested in the crop year 1935–36 that may be marketed exempt from payment of the tax levied by such act, as amended, is hereby legalized and ratified, and all apportionments and other action taken pursuant to such ascertainment and proclamation are legalized and ratified and confirmed as fully to all intents and purposes as if such amount had been fixed specifically by act of Congress.

SEC. 41. Section 17 of an act entitled "An act to place the cotton industry on a sound commercial basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in putting cotton into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to provide funds for paying additional benefits under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes", approved April 21, 1934, as amended, is amended by inserting "(a)" before the first sentence thereof and by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Appropriations for administrative expenses under this act are authorized to be made available to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to pay any person, who, in connection with the operation of any cotton gin, incurred additional expenses in connection with the administration of this act with respect to cotton harvested and ginned during any crop year when the above-mentioned act is in effect, and who applies to the Secretary therefor, compensation at the rate of 25 cents per bale of such cotton ginned by such person."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. The next amendment begins on page 73, "Amendments to Kerr Tobacco Act." I will state to the Senate that this is practically a continuation of the present act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 73, after line 17, it is proposed to insert the following:

AMENDMENTS TO KERR TOBACCO ACT

SEC. 42. The title of the act entitled "An act to place the tobacco-growing industry on a sound financial and economic basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in the production and marketing of tobacco entering into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, and for other purposes", approved June 28, 1934, is amended to read as follows:

"An act to place the tobacco-growing industry on a sound financial and economic basis, to prevent unfair competition and practices in the production and marketing of tobacco entering into the channels of interstate and foreign commerce, to raise revenue, and for other purposes."

SEC. 43. Section 1 of said act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(l) The term 'Puerto Rican tobacco' means all leaf tobacco classified as type 46 in the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Service and Regulatory Announcements Numbered 118."

"(m) The term 'cigar-wrapper tobacco' means all leaf tobacco classified in class 6 in the United States Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Service and Regulatory Announcements Numbered 118."

SEC. 44. Section 2 of said act is amended by inserting after the words "consumption of tobacco" a comma and the words "to raise revenue."

SEC. 45. Subsection (b) of section 3 of said act is amended by striking out the period and the remainder of the subsection following the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and to all tobacco harvested in the crop year 1935–36, except Maryland tobacco, Puerto Rican tobacco, and cigar-wrapper tobacco. Thereafter whenever the Secretary of Agriculture determines (1) that the imposition of the tax upon any particular type of tobacco is necessary for the orderly marketing of such tobacco in interstate and foreign commerce and to effectuate the declared policy of this act, and (2) that two-thirds of the land engaged in the production of such type of tobacco during the crop year in which such determination is made is voted in favor of the levy of the tax upon the sale of such type of tobacco, he shall proclaim such determination at least 60 days prior to the next succeeding crop year, and the tax shall thereafter apply to the sale of tobacco of such type harvested during the crop year next following the date of such proclamation. All persons who have the right, during the crop year in which such determination is made, to sell or to receive a share of the proceeds derived from the sale of tobacco of any type produced by them, or produced on land owned or leased by them, shall be entitled to vote, and the proportion of all the votes cast in each county which are cast in favor of levying the tax upon the sale of such type of tobacco shall determine the proportion of the total amount of tobacco land in such county which shall be deemed to have been voted in favor of levying such tax. The tax provided for by subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to any tobacco harvested after April 30, 1939."

SEC. 46. Subsection (a) of section 5 of said act is amended by inserting after the designation "(a)" at the beginning thereof the following: "(1)"; and by inserting at the end of said subsection the following paragraph:

"(2) The Secretary of Agriculture shall issue to any person, who, because of religious or moral scruples, is unwilling or unable to become a contracting producer, similar tax-payment warrants covering the quantity of tobacco produced by such person: Provided, That the Secretary determines that such person has not planted a greater acreage of tobacco nor sold a greater quantity of tobacco than he could have planted or sold as a contracting producer."

SEC. 47. Subsection (b) of section 5 of said act is amended by striking out the first sentence of said subsection and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"There shall be available for issuance by the Secretary of Agriculture further warrants, covering an amount of tobacco of any type equal to 3 percent of the amount of tobacco of such type covered by the warrants issuable or issued to all contracting producers under the provisions of subsection (a) of this section, to persons engaged in the production of tobacco of such type who do not enter into such contracts and as to whom the Secretary determines that no equitable allotment of tobacco acreage or production is possible under such tobacco contracts. Such warrants shall be issued, upon application therefor, upon such basis or classification as the Secretary deems will effectuate the declared policy of this act and will be fair and just, and as will apply to all persons eligible to receive warrants under this subsection uniformly on the basis or classification adopted: Provided, That warrants covering two-thirds of the amount of any type of tobacco to cover which warrants are available under this subsection shall be issued, upon application therefor, only to persons who receive warrants covering 1,500 pounds or less of any type of tobacco."

SEC. 48. Subsection (d) of section 5 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"If any tax-payment warrant is erroneously issued to any person, or if the Secretary of Agriculture determines pursuant to this subsection that any person to whom any tax-payment warrant is issued has failed to comply in any crop year with any provision of any agreement entered into by such person pursuant to the Agricultural Adjustment Act or has failed to comply with any rule or regulation issued by the Secretary of Agriculture pursuant to this act or the Agricultural Adjustment Act, any warrant issued during such crop year to such person shall be void upon demand in writing for the return of such warrant made by the Secretary of Agriculture to the person to whom such warrant was issued. If any tax-payment warrant which has been accepted in payment of the tax imposed by this act upon the sale of tobacco becomes void pursuant to this subsection either before or after such acceptance, the person to whom such warrant was issued shall, notwithstanding such acceptance of such warrant, be liable for the full amount of the tax upon such sale."

SEC. 49. Section 8 of said act is amended by striking out subsection (b) of that section and inserting in lieu thereof two new subsections as follows:

"(b) All persons, in whatever capacity acting, including producers, warehousemen, processors of tobacco, and common carriers, having information with respect to tobacco produced or sold, may be required to make a return in regard thereto, setting forth the amount of tobacco produced, sold, or delivered, the name and address of the person who produced, sold, or delivered said tobacco, or to whom said tobacco was sold or delivered, the price paid on such sale, and any other and further information which the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Agriculture, shall by regulations prescribe as necessary for the proper administration and collection of the tax. Any person required to make any such return shall render a true and accurate return to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

"(c) Any person willfully failing or refusing to file any return required to be filed under this section, or filing willfully any false return, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000."

SEC. 50. Section 9 of said act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Any person who is authorized in writing by the Secretary of Agriculture to act as his agent in the administration of this act shall, while he is acting as such agent, have the power to administer oaths in connection with the execution of forms required by regulations issued pursuant to sections 7 and 8 of this act, but no fee or compensation shall be charged or received by any such agent for administering such an oath."

SEC. 51. The first sentence of subsection (a) of section 10 of said act is amended to read as follows: "The proceeds heretofore and hereafter derived from the tax are hereby appropriated to be available to the Secretary of Agriculture for rental and benefit payments under the Agricultural Adjustment Act to contracting producers, for administrative expenses, refunds of taxes, redemption of tax-payment warrants heretofore or hereafter received by contracting producers subsequent to the sale of the tobacco covered by said warrants and subsequent to payment of the tax imposed upon such sale by section 3 of this act, and other payments under this act."

SEC. 52. Subsection (a) of section 11 of said act is amended effective as of the date of the enactment of the said act by striking out the words "6 months" and by inserting in lieu thereof the words "1 year."

SEC. 53. Section 14 of said act is amended to read as follows:

"The Secretary of Agriculture is directed not to refuse on the ground of lateness any offer by a tobacco producer to become a contracting producer, if such offer is filed with the Secretary of Agriculture within 30 days after the date of the proclamation by the Secretary of Agriculture, pursuant to subsection (b) of section 3 of this act."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether any hearings were held on this part of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. No, Mr. President, for the reason that it is practically the law as it now stands.

Mr. COPELAND. Did any appeals come in from any concerns to have hearings on this subject?

Mr. SMITH. No; only on the processing tax.

Mr. COPELAND. Not on this part of the bill?

Mr. SMITH. No.

Mr. COPELAND. What part of the bill was it on which these gentlemen desired hearings?

Mr. SMITH. It was with reference to the processing tax?

Mr. COPELAND. Where do we find it in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. It is just the reenactment of the Smith-Kerr bill. That is the point to which I called attention heretofore, that in levying the processing tax, when the parity price was reached, or when the price was above the parity price, the processing tax should be reduced in proportion as it approached parity. That subject was discussed somewhat yesterday.

Mr. COPELAND. What effect will this provision have upon the cigar industry?

Mr. SMITH. It has nothing to do with it.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator point out to me, so that I may not make any mistake about it—because I am unfamiliar with the bill—the part of the bill over which the cigar manufacturers are disturbed?

Mr. SMITH. It is the processing tax.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator point out to me where in the bill that is?

Mr. SMITH. It has already been passed over. That is on page 20 of the bill. The pending amendment has nothing whatever to do with that; and if the Senator will permit us to act on this amendment, I shall return to the matter to which he has referred.

Mr. COPELAND. Very well. With that understanding, I shall be glad to desist.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. Yesterday I was discussing with the Senator from South Carolina the committee amendment on page 40; and I understood from the Senator that the processing tax, when it reached a certain amount would cease entirely. Apparently that is not the case. It is always 10 percent. Is that correct?

Mr. SMITH. No; it is 10 percent during a current period, but if 2 months preceding the beginning of the next current year it is evident that the conditions are such that the price will be parity or above, then it will be seen that the bill provides that it may be zero.

Mr. GERRY. Where is that provision? I do not understand that.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator will allow us to get through with the pending amendment, we will return to that question.

Mr. COPELAND. May I say to the Senator from Rhode Island—I assume his interest is the same as mine—that I am taking it for granted that we shall have the opportunity to present the cause of the cigar manufacturers as it should be presented.

Mr. GERRY. I was not thinking of that. I was thinking of the matter in a broader sense.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I ask what section is under consideration?

Mr. SMITH. It is the last committee amendment, beginning on page 73, after line 18.

Mr. COPELAND. I may say to the Senator from California that some of us who live in States where cigars are manufactured have been told of the manufacturers' great distress over the processing tax on tobacco. I thought it was to be found in connection with the amendment which we have just reached, but I have been assured by the Senator from South Carolina, who is all wisdom on this matter, that this is not the place in the bill where it is to be found.

Mr. SMITH. No; this is not the place.

Mr. COPELAND. I am told that it is on page 40, and that it has already been agreed to take it up again. Relying upon that assurance, I am willing, so far as I am concerned, to desist for the moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment beginning on page 73 and continuing to the end of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, the committee amendments now have all been passed upon except those which were passed over. I ask that the clerk now may begin with the first amendment which was passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, probably the amendments were passed over at the suggestion of Senators who may wish to be present. Therefore, would it not be well to have a quorum call?

Mr. SMITH. That is a good suggestion. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Keyes	Pope
Ashurst	Coolidge	King	Radcliffe
Austin	Copeland	La Follette	Reynolds
Bachman	Costigan	Lewis	Robinson
Bailey	Dickinson	Logan	Russell
Bankhead	Dieterich	Lonergan	Schall
Barbour	Donahey	McAdoo	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Duffy	McGill	Sheppard
Bilbo	Fletcher	McKellar	Shipstead
Black	Frazier	McNary	Smith
Bone	George	Maloney	Steiwer
Borah	Gerry	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Brown	Gibson	Minton	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	Moore	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Murphy	Truman
Burke	Guffey	Murray	Tydings
Byrd	Hale	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Harrison	Norbeck	Van Nuys
Capper	Hastings	Norris	Wagner
Caraway	Hatch	Nye	Walsh
Carey	Hayden	O'Mahoney	Wheeler
Chavez	Holt	Overton	White
Clark	Johnson	Pittman

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Ninety-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

The first amendment passed over will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment passed over, at the request of Mr. MCNARY, is in subsection (2), on page 10, after line 21, under the heading "Commodities to which applicable."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, that is the provision, I take it, beginning with the title "Commodities to which applicable", and proceeding from there down through line 10, on page 11?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to offer an amendment perfecting the committee amendment, if I may do so.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. STEIWER. This particular proposal was, as I remember, passed over at the request of my colleague [Mr. MCNARY]. It happens that my colleague at the moment is not in the Chamber, and I do not know whether or not he is advised that the matter is now being called up. I am wondering if it might not be agreeable to all concerned that the Senate proceed for the moment to the consideration of some other amendment and return to this amendment at a later time?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have no objection to that.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have none.

Mr. STEIWER. I am sure my colleague would appreciate that courtesy being extended.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is it agreeable to the Senator from California that the amendment be passed over?

Mr. JOHNSON. It is perfectly agreeable to me, but let me say to the Senator in charge of the bill that what I want to do is to add one item so that it will come under the purview of the bill. It will be observed in lines 5 and 6, on page 11, the words appear "not including vegetables for canning." I want to add to that particular provision so as to make it read "not including vegetables, other than asparagus, for canning." I will not take the matter up now because of the absence of the Senator from Oregon. I am simply submitting that thought for consideration, and, inasmuch as it affects a single product which comes practically altogether from the State which I have the honor in part to represent, I question if there will be any objection to it.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I do not now want to argue the matter, but I may have to take issue with the Senator from California, because Georgia is now raising asparagus and is canning asparagus.

Mr. JOHNSON. I congratulate Georgia and welcome her to the fold.

Mr. GEORGE. We do not want to have our growth arrested by too much restriction upon us. However, I understand this particular part of the bill, subsection (2), is to be passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I file my amendment?

Mr. GEORGE. I understand the Senator is offering an amendment, but may I ask that it be passed over until morning, because those of us from the Southeast are very much interested in other phases of this provision.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That will be perfectly agreeable to me.

Mr. COPELAND. May I ask the Senator from Georgia in what particular provision on page 11 he is interested?

Mr. GEORGE. I am very much interested in the House provision which is stricken out beginning on line 4, page 11, which reads "(not including fruits for canning)."

Mr. COPELAND. That is, the Senator wishes to restore the House language?

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to restore the House language.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to join with the Senator in that wish.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So do I.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I say to the Senator from Georgia, in the language which he used a moment ago in respect to California's famous asparagus that I am sorry, indeed, to take issue with him, but I shall take issue with him upon the particular suggestion he makes.

Mr. President, I may add that this is one of the important amendments to this bill so far as producers and canners are concerned, and it will take some considerable time to dispose of it, I have no doubt. I say that to the Senator in charge of the bill in order that he may govern himself accordingly. With the consent of the Senate I filed my amendment in relation to asparagus.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California a question. He is seeking a modification of the words in parenthesis, in line 5, by inserting in the clause "not including vegetables for canning" the words "other than asparagus." Is that his amendment?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes; so as not to include asparagus in the exception in the canning process.

Mr. COPELAND. I am not quite clear as to the Senator's objective.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator from New York will observe, the clause reads:

> Vegetables (not including vegetables for canning).

In the clause relating to canning I am seeking to include asparagus, which is not included in the bill as presented.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the position of the Senator is that vegetables and fruits, particularly to which vegetable he is now addressing himself, should be exempt from the operation of the bill; that is to say, that vegetables which are used by the canners should not be subjected to the tax or to the regimentation provided in the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON. No; I am not saying so. The bill exempts all vegetables that are canned. I am seeking to include in the bill asparagus and exempting it from that particular provision of the bill.

Mr. KING. If I understand the Senator correctly, I agree with him.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well. Fruits, however, are in a different category.

Mr. KING. I understand; and I would treat them as I would treat vegetables.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would not.

Mr. KING. I understand California has some citrus and other fruits. It merely shows—and I say it with the utmost good feeling—that geography cuts some figure in legislation.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I understood a moment ago the Senator in charge of the bill to say that the provisions on page 11, subparagraph (2) of section 8 (c), are to go over until tomorrow for consideration?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is my understanding of the request. I merely want to accommodate those who are interested in the section.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I have proposed and there is now lying on the desk an amendment striking out the word "hops" in the same section and "hops and their products" in another section. I want to be certain that we have some definite understanding as to when the provision may come up.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, in the interest of making progress, I should like to suggest that particular items of this section as to which there is such a request be passed over, and let us finish those which are not in controversy and as to which there is no request that they go over until tomorrow.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am perfectly willing to abide by any decision which may be agreeable.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That will preserve the right to have any amendment go over which any Senator desires to have passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is perfectly satisfactory to me. The amendment in question, as the Senator will understand, was being passed over at the instance of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, my request related only to the provision affecting fruits and vegetables, if the amendment of the Senator from California should be held in order. I do not know whether that amendment would be in order at this time, though, of course, it subsequently would be. My reason for making the request was that at the moment I did not see the Senators from Florida in the Chamber, and I must leave the Chamber at an early hour this afternoon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator wants the committee amendment striking out the words "and not including fruits for canning" passed over?

Mr. GEORGE. That is the particular amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. On that amendment there will be considerable debate.

Mr. GEORGE. I apprehend it will take some time to debate it, and probably its consideration could not be concluded today.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from California desires his amendment incorporating the words "other than asparagus" passed over.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am ready to take it up, but, as I understand, the entire provision is to be passed over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment suggested by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is not now in order. It is not an amendment to a Senate amendment. It is an amendment to the House text, and we are now considering committee amendments. The amendment of the Senator from California will come up as an individual amendment at the proper time.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is quite true, as the Senator says. I merely offered it for the purpose of having it before the Senate when this subject should come before it, in order that we might discuss the whole proposition; but, inasmuch as the particular provision which relates to commodities to which the title is applicable has gone over, I have presented the small amendment as to asparagus so that the Senate may know what ultimately is the intention of those of us who are going to argue on one side of this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACK in the chair). Does the Senator from California desire his amendment to lie on the table?

Mr. JOHNSON. I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be received and lie on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 201) giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to said encampment.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 201) giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to said encampment, and it was signed by the Vice President.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I was advised during the consideration of this bill by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that no hearings would be granted. I had a number of requests for hearings and communicated that fact to the chairman of the committee.

Upon receiving information that no hearings would be held, I made further inquiry and learned that Mr. Chester Davis and representatives of the Department of Agriculture were holding conferences with the committee and aiding in drafting the bill now before us. I am making no criticisms, but cannot understand why the public were afforded no opportunity to be heard when a measure of such vital importance to the country was under consideration. When I learned that no public hearings were to be held, I wrote the following letter to the chairman:

JUNE 23, 1935.

Hon. ELLISON D. SMITH,
Chairman Committee on Agriculture and Forestry,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am advised that the so-called "A. A. A. bill" is before the Agriculture Committee of the Senate for consideration. I am not a member of the committee, but I shall be glad to obtain information, which I think is available to your committee, in order that I may be better advised how to vote upon the various provisions of the bill when it shall come before the Senate. I shall be glad to have information regarding the matters herein referred to, all of which, I believe, are pertinent to the questions involved in the bill now before your committee.

A. Under the head of "Operation of processing taxes, benefit payments, and voluntary agreements to reduce production of wheat, corn, and hogs", I shall be glad to have information respecting the following:

1. Amount of money raised by processing taxes—the amounts by commodities and by States.

2. The amounts, by commodities and by States, paid to producers.

3. The amount of reduction of production (a) wheat acreage, by States; (b) corn acreage, by States; (c) sows and pigs slaughtered, by States.

4. Amount of increase in consumers' costs, including increased prices for flour, bread, and typical cuts of pork and beef not only in rural communities, but in typical cities.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. This is a letter which the Senator addressed to the chairman of the committee, is it not?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will be interested to know that in Rochester, N. Y.—familiar to the Senator as near the birthplace of his father—this tax has added to the food costs as regards meat, which the Senator has just mentioned, as follows:

Pork loins, 4.86 cents per pound.

Bacon, 4.29 cents per pound.

Fresh ham, 4.98 cents per pound.

Smoked ham, 5.15 cents per pound.

Pork sausage, 1.71 cents per pound.

Mr. KING. According to the views of some persons the Senator ought not to be interested in the consumers.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, no; not at all. My people up there should live on sawdust. [Laughter.]

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a single observation?

Mr. KING. I should prefer to continue reading the letter, but I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. MURPHY. Will the Senator from New York advise us where he got the figures showing these increases?

Mr. COPELAND. From the Rochester Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. MURPHY. From a chamber of commerce?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. I would expect that. Furthermore, would the Senator advise whether or not all these price increases were due to the processing tax, or was some part of it due to the mark-up made by the retailers?

Mr. COPELAND. I dare say both would enter into it, but there is no question at all that somebody is paying the processing tax, and that "somebody" is the consumer. There is no question, of course, that advantage is taken of the situation and that the price is marked up, as the Senator from Iowa suggests. Nevertheless, the great consuming public are the ones who pay the bill.

Mr. KING. Obviously the Senator from Iowa does not wish the Senate to reach the conclusion that the imposition of a 30-cent tax upon wheat—which I am informed is to be advanced to 33 cents—will add to the cost of flour to the consumer?

Mr. MURPHY. No; I would not make such a contention. I presume that the Senator from New York is prepared to vote for that provision in the bill which denies the right to the processors to recover the processing taxes paid, because he has stated that those taxes were paid by the consumer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall continue and let my two friends, one from Iowa and one from New York, fight this matter out between themselves; but I do assert that a processing tax upon commodities raises the prices to the consumers, and I fear that Congress and executive authorities too often refuse to consider the interests of the millions of consumers. This has resulted in industrial disturbances, buyers' strikes, and in some cases demoralization in our social and economic life.

Mr. COPELAND. O Mr. President, I do not have to fight with anybody. I do not want to fight with anybody, but I know that when, by reason of legislation, we increase prices the consumers, the public, pay the bill.

Mr. KING. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COPELAND. I am interested, because I have in my State 13,000,000 consumers. They have gone along very patiently with these legislative proposals. Nevertheless, they are paying at least 10 percent of the cost of these taxes. Therefore we have in our State some interest in this matter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama for that purpose?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Are not the same consumers paying tariff taxes on manufactured articles in his State?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes; but the manufacturing industries in my State represent a very small proportion of the population. I have thousands and millions of constituents in my State who do not have anything to eat but "the sidewalks of New York", and they are not interested in the tariff which the manufactured products may have; but they have an interest, when somebody gives them a dollar, to be able to go out and buy some food with it. When they have to pay an additional 4 or 5 cents a pound for the meat which they buy with that dollar, then the consumers in my State have a direct personal interest in what this tax may be.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me we might rise above local or sectional or geographical lines in dealing with legislation, especially proposed legislation of the importance of the pending bill, and envision the entire people and seek legislation promotive of the happiness and welfare, not of my State or any particular State, not of one group or another, but of the entire population. Any proposed legislation which discriminates against the millions of consumers, whether it be through the tariff or processing taxes or otherwise, calls for serious scrutiny, indeed, for severe condemnation. Undoubtedly many tariff laws have unduly favored industry and adversely affected agriculture and the wage earners of our country. The farmers for decades blindly followed the powerful captains of tariff monopolies. They supported the Republican tariff policies to their own injury and to the disadvantage of the mass of the American people.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. I am wondering whether or not the A. A. A. amendments are on the "must" list. I understand representatives of certain interests went to the Executive Offices yesterday and were told by one of the secretaries there that this legislation was not on the "must" list. It is so reported in the New York Herald Tribune of today.

Mr. KING. May I say very frankly that I am not guided by the alleged "must" lists. I attempt to vote my own convictions regardless of the convictions or attitude of others.

I continue reading the letter:

5. The advance in bread prices in various cities; also advance in meat prices in various cities.
6. Estimated cost to consumers by reason of increase of prices in the commodities referred to.
7. Estimated number of consumers not living on farms benefited by benefit payments.
8. Total number of farmer beneficiaries; that is, those receiving benefit payments in wheat, corn, and hog programs.
B. Legality of processing taxes.
1. List of cases already brought to test the validity of processing taxes
2. Present status of each case.

Before we conclude the debate upon this bill I shall place in the RECORD the number of cases which are now pending challenging the constitutionality of the A. A. A. Act; and may I add, judging from the provisions and terms of the measure before us, more such will be instituted, if this bill shall be enacted into law, than have been brought under the original A. A. A. Act. Its provisions are so conflicting, confused, and subtle, and, as I believe, so in contravention of personal and State rights, that numerous actions will be instituted in the courts to restrain its enforcement and to obtain decisions against its validity.

Returning to the letter from which I am reading:

C. Administrative cost of the A. A. A.
1. Number of employees on Federal pay roll in A. A. A. work, including the number for each month since the A. A. A. law went into effect: (a) List of employees receiving above $5,000 per year; (b) total annual pay roll as of January 1, 1935.
2. Number of county agents and assistants on joint Federal and State pay rolls, and also the number active in the A. A. A. work, giving the number by States.

May I add parenthetically that in President Wilson's administration for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, the entire cost of the Government, including Federal employees, the Army, the Navy, and every activity of the Government, was but approximately $1,000,000,000.

For the fiscal year 1935 the salaries of Federal employees will exceed one and a quarter billion dollars. With the enormous Federal expenditures, it is not to be wondered that there are deficits of three or four billions a year, mounting taxes, and complaints from people in all parts of the United States because of the heavy burdens resting upon them.

3. Number of women and men placed on community or commodity committees working on A. A. A. activities. If possible list by States.
(a) The manner in which these committee men and committee women are paid, and the source of the funds.
(b) The total amount of such payments by States.
D. Activities of Consumers' Council.
1. List of employees and persons engaged in this activity in A. A. A. since its organization.
2. Salaries paid, and to whom, above $5,000.
3. Sample copy, cost and circulation of Consumers' Guide, and list of other published material and news releases.
4. List of State and city consumers' councils cooperating with Federal Consumers' Council.
E. Operation of marketing agreements and licenses.
1. List of licenses put into effect for each and all commodities.
2. List of licenses now in effect.
3. List of court cases brought against the A. A. A. with respect to licenses, with present status of each case.
4. General statement with respect to number and localities in which A. A. A. or license administrators have made either voluntary or involuntary inspections of books and records of processors and handlers.

As stated, I assume that the committee will have information respecting the matters herein referred to, and for that reason I am respectfully asking for the same.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM H. KING.

The chairman of the committee—and I am betraying no confidence in making this statement—told me he thought that the information sought would be available from the Department of Agriculture; and I understood him—if I am incorrect I hope he will correct me—to say that I would receive the information. I shall be glad when I receive the information referred to in my letter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator the date of his letter?

Mr. KING. June 23 of this year.

Mr. COPELAND. That was about 3 weeks ago.

Mr. KING. That was after I learned that the committee would grant no hearings. Believing the data mentioned in my letter was pertinent to the legislation sought and would be helpful in its consideration, I endeavored to secure the same.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I wished to have the Senator know that he is not the only one who is complaining of the refusal of the committee to grant a hearing to those affected by the proposed legislation. The Senator knows that there is invested in the rayon industry about $250,000,000; it employs nearly 200,000 persons; and the industry sought a hearing upon a proposal to impose upon it a compensatory tax of 5½ cents per pound.

The imposition of that particular tax simply means that our domestic rayon industry will have to surrender its market to imported silk commodities. The imposition of the tax is so serious that it may be destructive of the industry; yet the representatives of the industry were not granted a hearing before the committee, and without such a hearing this tax is to be imposed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I regret that hearings were not granted. I know that the House Committee on Agriculture held hearings and hearings were had before the Senate committee when it considered either the first or the second bill referred to it for consideration. Four or five bills, as I recollect, have been considered by the Agriculture Committees of the House and Senate during this session, and the one now before us is either the fourth or the fifth. So unsatisfactory to the country have been the bills prepared by the A. A. A. officials and their technical experts and legal and other advisers, that over and over again they have been reconsidered by the committees referred to; and each reconsideration has, in my opinion, made the succeeding bill more oppressive, bureaucratic, and undemocratic.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Alabama?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order that there may be no misunderstanding I desire to say that for about 2 weeks the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry held protracted hearings, and gave an opportunity to come before the committee to everybody who desired to come before us on the bill which was reported to the Senate and was on the floor of the Senate for consideration the day the N. R. A. decision was rendered. Practically all the changes made after the bill went back to the committee were made to put it in line with the decision in the N. R. A. case. The committee felt that after 2 weeks of hearings on all other phases it was unnecessary again to open up the matter and hold additional hearings.

Mr. MURPHY, Mr. WAGNER, and other Senators addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KING. I will yield in a moment. I have the bill which is now reported, 80 pages in length. I have the three or four bills which preceded the one before us, the first one containing but a few pages; but the more the subject was considered the more voluminous were the succeeding bills and the more expansive and drastic were their terms. The evolutionary powers continued until there was born the measure before us containing 80 pages of confused, complex, and subtle provisions.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. I desire to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact—I have been so informed by those interested in the rayon industry—that not one interested party was heard by the committee before this amendment was included in the bill by the Agricultural Committee?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Senator that his information is correct. The amendment was put in by the committee toward the close of its consideration of the bill; but the Senator should know, and I assume he does, that the matter had been the subject of active hearings by the Department for some months, so that the facts were developed.

Mr. WAGNER. Exactly; but I do not think the committee took advantage of those facts, because the matter was under consideration by the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for a period of over a year, and they did not impose the tax which it is proposed to impose under this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They did not render any decision at all.

Mr. WAGNER. My conclusion is that they were persuaded that the imposition of the tax would be an injustice.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They never reached that conclusion so far as any announcement was concerned; but I simply made that statement to indicate to the Senator that the subject had been one of long investigation, and everybody had had an opportunity to go on record.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield for just one more question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. It is a fact that the Agricultural Adjustment Administration did not recommend the particular amendment to which I have reference?

Mr. BANKHEAD. They made no recommendation either way to the committee about it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Utah yield to me? He has been very patient.

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to emphasize what my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] has said. There is very great resentment in my State because those interested in rayon and those interested in tobacco were not given an opportunity to be heard. I believe that in fairness to all American citizens there should have been an opportunity for hearings. I am not blaming the committee. I know my own committee has been very active. It has been impossible to hear everybody who desired to be heard. Nevertheless, when there are to be imposed upon this industry and that industry great contributions, it is wise and proper and American that they should be heard upon their request. They have not been heard, and of course they resent it.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. GERRY. Since the Agricultural Adjustment Administration did not recommend the imposition of this tax, is it not fair to infer that they did not think it was a wise tax to put upon the industry? They had long hearings, I understand, upon the subject of rayon.

Mr. KING. I shall not attempt to answer the Senator's question as to the views of the A. A. A. officials.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield for a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think I can answer the Senator from Rhode Island. Last year's bill provided, I believe, and the original bill provided, that the Department might put a processing tax on rayon. It gave them the authority to do it. The Department had a hearing, when all sides were heard; and after that hearing they declined to do it, and now have made no recommendation about it. Under those circumstances, it seems to me——

Mr. GERRY. It is very clear, then, that the Department felt that the tax was not a just tax.

Mr. McKELLAR. And ought not to be put on. I think so.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has been so gracious about yielding that I desire to add just one word. I wish to say that under the existing law the Agricultural Adjustment Administration have the power to impose this tax if they think it a fair compensatory tax. They have not done so. This provision is to compel the imposition of the tax by legislative mandate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, perhaps I was a little inaccurate in stating that I had received no information in response to the letter which I wrote to the chairman of the committee. I wish to modify that statement to this extent: I found on my desk 2 or 3 days ago a number of papers which came from the Department of Agriculture, but had no opportunity to examine them.

During the colloquy since I have had the floor I have hastily glanced at several pages of the same and shall refer to them in a few minutes. First let me refer to the statement made by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

My recollection is that a bill was before the Senate which had been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry after the decision of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case, perhaps before; I am not quite sure as to the time. The Senator from New Mexico will advise me.

Mr. HATCH. The bill was under consideration in the Senate at the time the decision was handed down.

Mr. KING. The bill was being considered in the Senate, the Senator from New Mexico advises us—and he is a member of the committee—when the famous and important Schechter case was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. It was evident that the A. A. A. Act of 1933, and the bill pending in the Senate when the Schechter case was decided, were unconstitutional; and the Senate thereupon referred back to the committee the measure then before it.

I had supposed, and I think the public had supposed, that when the bill went back to the committee there would be hearings, because the bill was of vital importance not alone to agriculture but to the American people as a whole.

But the committee granted no hearings. The public were accorded no opportunity to present their views and to meet the situation resulting from the decisions of the Supreme Court, which not only challenged the validity of the A. A. A. Act but in effect declared that provisions such as are found in the bill before us would be violative of fundamental law. I am advised that representatives of the A. A. A. were permitted to meet and confer with the committee, but the public and those who would be affected by the measure were not consulted or heard.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RUSSELL in the chair). Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In justice to the committee and to all parties concerned in the bill let me say that the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate waited until the House had completed its investigation and had passed the bill and sent it to the Senate. Hearings were had in the House. They went through all of the procedure that was necessary to take care of the public, and when the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate took the House bill under consideration they called in officials of the Department of Agriculture to find out in what respect the amendments now before us conform to the decision of the Supreme Court. We were not asking them for their advice; we simply wanted to know and to be shown what modification should be made so as to make the bill conform to the decision of the Supreme Court.

I think I can show by reading a part of the old law where the Secretary of Agriculture was given blanket power over nearly every agricultural commodity and practically to do his will. After the decision of the Supreme Court the articles which were to be affected by the bill were named specifically, and provisions were made that those who produced them should go through the process indicated in the law. We went over it line by line and paragraph by paragraph, in the presence of the full committee, with those who had suggested what they called "clarifying amendments", and I state here and now that there is not half the power conferred under the proposed amendments that was provided in the original law or was in the amendments previous to the decision of the Supreme Court.

We did not think it was necessary to hold hearings. We felt that the House had covered the ground, had met the requirements of the decision of the Supreme Court, and the committee, having reached the conclusion they did reach, reported the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not questioning the good faith of the committee; but I cannot resist the conclusion that a measure so vitally affecting the entire country should have been examined, analyzed, and passed through the crucible of public consideration and criticism before being reported back to the Senate. I cannot help but believe that the measure before us, as interpreted by the A. A. A. officials, will produce a radical change in the economic and political life of the people. It projects the Federal Government, through a powerful and Nation-wide organization, into intrastate concerns, and lays the foundation for compounding our political institutions into one colloidal mass.

I repeat that without hearings, without full opportunity to consider the bill and all of its implications, there has been thrust upon us a bill of 80 pages which is so complicated that it is difficult to interpret. As stated, this is the fourth or fifth edition, and each time it is considered and reconsidered it comes out changed, enlarged, and exaggerated. I suppose that if it went back to the committee it would emerge in a more gigantic form, physically and infinitely more complex and difficult of understanding.

Mr. President, I submit this criticism with respect to legislation, and I do it in the utmost good feeling, because committees upon which I serve are just as amenable to the criticism, and perhaps more so, than other committees.

Much of the important legislation enacted by Congress is prepared by so-called "experts", "brain trusters", lawyers from Harvard and New York, rather than by Members of the House and the Senate.

I repeat that many important measures are drafted by the departments. We are drifting into a departmental government, into a bureaucratic government, and, of course, relying, as we do, upon the bureaus and upon the departments and governmental agencies for information and for the preparation of bills, little by little we abdicate the responsibility resting upon us and take the measures which are submitted for our consideration.

So we have before us now a bill comprising 80 pages, whereas in the first bill that was offered and considered by the chairman of the committee, my recollection is that there were only 10 or 15, and it is quite likely it was a better bill than the one before us now. However, I shall not pursue that theme any longer.

The Senator states that the bill is less drastic than the original A. A. A. Act; that act, as many know, in many respects conferred almost unlimited power upon the Secretary of Agriculture to deal with agricultural products, and, though its oppressive and invalid features were pointed out in both Houses and in many parts of our country, it became a law.

Many persons believed that it contained provisions which attempted to delegate legislative power to the Secretary of Agriculture and that it was unconstitutional.

Mr. President, I fear that this measure, if enacted into law, conferring, as it does, such power upon the Secretary of Agriculture, will be regarded as a guide and precedent for further legislation infringing upon individual and State rights. It will be interpreted by many as an abdication by Congress of its authority and an illegal delegation of authority to executive agencies. It is the thought of some that in the near future measures will be presented to Congress recommended by some department of the Government which will compel every person to obtain a license to engage in every form of interstate commerce.

And the railroads under this plan will not be permitted to accept for transportation between States any commodity without having evidence that the producer and the shipper obtained the necessary license from the Department of Agriculture, or some agency set up by the executive department authorizing its shipment.

There is a movement to destroy local self-government, State sovereignty, and many inseparable and natural individual rights. Under the interstate-commerce provision the Constitution will be misinterpreted and distorted and perverted efforts will be made to control through a powerful bureaucracy the business life and the conduct of the people generally. This bill may be a step in that direction.

Mr. President, corroborative of what was said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I have here a pamphlet of 24 pages, and there are two or three supplements, prepared by the Department of Agriculture and signed by the Secretary of Agriculture, dealing with the subject of milk in the Los Angeles area; and I presume that similar publications have been prepared with respect to other sections of the United States. I think Senators would be surprised if they were carefully to read the provisions of this pamphlet. It contains provisions for the fixing of prices not only for what shall be paid to the producer, but what shall be paid by the handler; prices are fixed with respect to transportation charges; advisory committees are set up, and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized in this code of rules, regulations, if not laws, to exercise almost unlimited authority in the selection of agents and in the execution of the rules and regulations which he may formulate.

His agents are authorized to impose a tax upon the producers of milk and the handlers, those who sell it. The fund collected by such agents appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture may be employed to pay their expenses and the expenses of administration.

Mr. President, let me read a few sentences to show how subtle has been the way by which it has been attempted to bring the domestic production and consumption of milk in Los Angeles district under the control of Federal agencies. It might be thought by some that I am reading from a legislative code. We have abdicated the authority to the Secretary of Agriculture, and he promulgates this law.

Whereas section 8 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, provides as follows—

Then it quotes section 8—

SEC. 8. In order to effectuate the declared policy, the Secretary of Agriculture shall have power—

Then it quotes subsection 3—

(3) To issue licenses permitting processors, associations of producers, and others to engage in the handling, in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, of any agricultural commodity or product thereof, or any competing commodity or product thereof.

Such licenses shall be subject to such terms and conditions not in conflict with existing acts of Congress or regulations pursuant thereto, as may be necessary to eliminate unfair practices or charges that prevent or tend to prevent the effectuation of the declared policy and the restoration of normal economic conditions in the marketing of such commodities or products and the financing thereof.

This code further declares that the Secretary may—require any licensee under this section to furnish such reports as to quantities of agricultural commodities or products thereof bought and sold and the prices thereof, and as to trade practices and charges, and to keep such system of accounts as may be necessary for the purpose of part 2 of this title.

And whereas—

Now this is the important part—

R. G. Tugwell, Acting Secretary of Agriculture, acting under the provisions of said act, for the purposes and within the limitations therein contained, and pursuant to the regulations issued thereunder has on the 31st day of May 1934 isued a license for milk in the Los Angeles sales area, which license was subsequently amended on August 21, September 29, and on December 15, 1934.

Keep in mind that issued licenses were amended and again amended, as there is no limitation upon the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture or Mr. Tugwell, who was the Acting Secretary, to issue licenses and amend the same.

And whereas the undersigned finds that the marketing, distribution, and handling of milk and the products thereof covered by this license—

Keep in mind that this is a limited area of the State of California. It is not Nevada or Utah or Oregon. This area is a segment of the State of California. The language is so framed that it may be made to appear that the transactions in milk are intended and subject to the code or regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. The code continues—are in the current of interstate and/or foreign commerce since the portion thereof which occurs within the bounds of a single State affects and actually and potentially competes with the marketing, distribution, and handling of commodities and products which occur between or among several States.

This is a clever and subtle way of endeavoring to deal with local and intrastate business as if it were interstate. In effect the order states that the production of milk in Los Angeles affects the production and consumption of milk in other States—perhaps in New York or Maine—and therefore every transaction relating to its production or sale must come within the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution. I continue to read:

And since the commodity and the products thereof covered by this license cannot be separated into interstate and intrastate portions, the supply and the marketing, distribution, and handling thereof being inextricably commingled, so that it is impossible to regulate the interstate marketing, distributing, and handling without also regulating the intrastate marketing distribution and handling, and the failure to regulate the latter will defeat and obstruct the purposes of the act with respect to the former; and

Whereas the undersigned has found, and does hereby find, as follows:

That on June 1, 1934, the effective date of the license for milk in the Los Angeles sales area, and for a protracted period prior thereto, a severe disparity existed between the prices received by producers of milk supplying the Los Angeles sales area and the prices of nonagricultural commodities, which disparity had largely destroyed the purchasing power of such producers for industrial products, had broken down the orderly exchange of commodities, had seriously impaired the assets of such producers, had affected the marketing and distribution of milk in the Los Angeles sales area—

Not other States, but a limited part of the State of California—with a national public interest, and had burdened and obstructed the normal currents of commerce in milk in the Los Angeles sales area—

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The testimony of milk producers in my State is exactly what the Senator from Utah is bringing out with reference to California. My State is the greatest dairy State, so far as potable milk, beverage milk, is concerned, and I do not know of any dairy farmer in my State who is not in bitter opposition to this provision.

Mr. KING. Absolutely; and yet the dairy interests there would be brought under the powerful hand of the Secretary of Agriculture by virtue of the statutes which he promulgates.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wonder if the Senator will permit me in his time to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. SMITH] if any substantial number of dairy farmers have asked that this milk provision be inserted in the bill?

Mr. SMITH. From the facts submitted to the committee I think every member of the Senate now knows that there has been no more notorious chiseling of the producer and the consumer than with respect to milk, even if only half of what was brought before the committee was true. The producers throughout the country, according to the statements given to the committee, were desirous of having made some provision by which they could be assured that in the channels of interstate commerce they could be protected, so at least they could get some return for the milk they produced.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was dealing primarily, of course, with intrastate licensing such as is now being described by the Senator from Utah. I did not want to intrude on the Senator, but I thought I was going to get a shorter answer from the Senator from South Carolina; and I say that respectfully. My question was whether any considerable number of farmers—hundreds of thousands or millions—were represented at the hearings by petition or telegram or otherwise, or was this bill written by those who know better than the farmers themselves know what is good for them?

Mr. SMITH. My impression is that of all the commodities outside of the staple crops which are under a processing tax—and milk is not—this provision is one which met the approval of all the farm organizations. How many people they represented is quite a different proposition.

Mr. TYDINGS. May I ask the Senator if the farmers of Pennsylvania asked for this provision?

Mr. SMITH. I am of the impression that the farm organization leaders, both of Pennsylvania and New Jersey, which is contiguous to the metropolitan territory of the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] known as "Greater New York", did ask for it.

Mr. TYDINGS. I wonder if the milk farmers of New York asked for this bill?

Mr. SMITH. I am rather of the opinion that those of the State did.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. President, I can answer that question "yes", and that the New York State authorities asked for it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to say a little more about the milk business. I had a visit the other day from Mr. Homer Jones, who is one of the largest producers of milk in New York State. I am speaking of the man who owns a herd and sells milk. He is not in the creamery business. He is a private individual and represents a large group of men I know. It so happens that once my job was to supervise the quality of milk sold in my city, and so I came in contact with these gentlemen. It is my judgment, from the testimony given to me by these actual producers of milk, that they are in bitter opposition to the bill.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the question of the attitude of the milk producers throughout the United States at this time. I can only say that I have received many protests against the assertion of authority by the Secretary of Agriculture over the production and handling of milk and milk products.

If I may be pardoned a personal allusion, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. MCCARRAN] and myself conducted hearings 2 years ago with respect to the milk shed in the District of Columbia. There were violent protests against Professor King, who was in the Department of Agriculture, attempting to formulate measures I assume analogous to those from which I am now reading.

I believe that a State has the right, under its police powers, to deal with the question of the protection of those within its limits, subject, of course, to constitutional limitations, State and National. What I am complaining about is the unlimited and unrestricted authority given under the A. A. A. Act, which authority the Secretary of Agriculture attempts to exercise, to handle not only the producers of milk but the distributors, and to fix prices and to exercise by licenses or orders absolute control over the milk industry in all parts of the United States, regardless of State lines and regardless of wise legislation which many States have enacted to deal with this important industry.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Not only can the constitutionality of this bill be questioned under the N. R. A. decision insofar as intrastate commerce is concerned, but I may point out to the Senator from Utah, with whose argument I am in general agreement, that many of the producers of milk have formed cooperatives and have their own organizations. In my opinion, they are perhaps better off than almost any other general class of farmers of the country. I am loath to interfere, particularly in intrastate commerce, where they are getting along perhaps better than they will after the Federal Government meddles with them.

Mr. KING. May I say to my friend from South Carolina that the farmers' cooperative associations have done a great deal of good, and I have been in favor of them. I fear that their usefulness may be impaired by the policies of the A. A. A. and the army of agents which it employs and uses in all parts of the land.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. If the Senator would study the bill he would find that the cooperatives are assimilated. They are taken care of. Their activities and their rules and regulations are not disturbed. The bill attempts to promote them, to try to add to their influence.

So much so is that true that under the authority which we have under the interstate commerce clause, the cooperatives of the States, the cooperatives engaged in intrastate business, are asked to cooperate with the regulations applying to interstate commerce, and wherever there is within the State an organization which is doing the work that is proposed to be done in interstate commerce, it is hoped that the officers will cooperate with the Federal officers.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, there is much truth in what my friend says, but I am expressing my opposition to the efforts which are being made by some officials in the Government to control every activity and regiment individuals to socialize industry, to bring the Government under the influence of great socialistic organizations or oppressive Federal bureaus and agencies.

I believe our fathers were wiser than we are, and that the Government which they handed down to us, if preserved in letter and in spirit, will enable this Nation to increase in influence, in power, and in moral leadership until its influence will be pervasive throughout the world.

If, however, we socialize this Republic, socialize industry, destroy private initiative and private property, and subject the people to the rule of a powerful bureaucracy here in Washington, this Nation will fail in reaching the goal which the fathers envisioned; and in accomplishing here and throughout the world the good which it was hoped by them, and is hoped by patriots now, it will accomplish.

I have been interrupted by my friends. I shall now recur to this code enacted by the Secretary of Agriculture:

That in order to maintain the prices required to be paid to producers for milk in and by said license for milk, Los Angeles sales area, as amended, it was and is necessary (a) to classify the prices which distributors shall pay for milk—

Price fixing; and if there was anything that made the N. R. A. unpopular it was the determination of big and little officials of the organization to fix commodity prices—

In accordance with the form in which it is ultimately consumed; (b) to provide for the equitable distribution among all producers supplying milk to the Los Angeles sales area of the aggregate return realized by all producers from the sale of such milk; and to encourage the production of milk at a uniform level throughout the year.

7. That all of the terms and conditions of said license—

The returns and conditions are to be prescribed by the representative of the Department of Agriculture—for milk—Los Angeles sales area, as amended, were and are necessary to establish and maintain prices for milk specified in said license, as amended—

And it has been amended several times, as I have indicated—and were and are necessary to and do (a) effectuate the policy of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as declared by Congress in section 2 thereof—

And so forth. Then I find another provision as follows:

Whereas the undersigned has determined to modify—

"The undersigned" promulgates the rules, enacts the law, and then modifies it—modify the terms and provisions of said license for milk, Los Angeles sales area, as amended, by issuing this amended license pursuant to section 8 (3) of the Agricultural Adjustment Act and applicable general regulations of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration; and

Whereas the undersigned finds that the subject matter of this amended license is embraced within the scope of a hearing heretofore held on a marketing agreement pursuant to applicable general regulations of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration; and

Now, therefore, the undersigned, acting under the authority vested in the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, as amended, hereby amends and modifies the terms and conditions of said license, as amended, and hereby licenses each and every distributor to engage in the business of distributing, marketing, or handling milk or cream as a distributor in the Los Angeles sales area, subject to the terms and conditions set forth in this amended license, hereinafter called the "license."

Then follow, on page 3, definitions, and, on page 4, further provisions—"Market administrators", for example. They are to be designated and named, with but little limitation upon their authority. The statute continues—and I have not time to examine its 24 pages—dealing with that question down in Los Angeles—not an interstate area but an intrastate area. Prices are fixed; producers and consumers and all others are placed under this blanket authority which is asserted by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. President, the A. A. A. has been a rather costly experiment, and I have no doubt that if the bill before us is enacted into law, its demands upon the Government and the public will be greater than the exactions under the present A. A. A. Act.

I stated a few moments ago that I have some data sent to me by the Agricultural Department, which are, in part at least, a response to the request for information which I submitted to the chairman of the committee to supply.

The statement I have before me is headed:

Summary of expenditures through April 30, 1935, analyzed by State and character.

The total expenditures of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, as certified here by the office of the comptroller of that organization, amount to $1,001,596,291.48.

The general administration amounts to $48,774,996.27.

The rental and benefits which have been paid amount, as stated here, to $727,391,226.08.

The amount paid for removal of surplus amounts to $225,430,069.48.

As stated, these items aggregate over a billion dollars. Who have paid for these enormous expenditures? The consumers of the country have paid the bill.

I find in the same list another statement, signed by John B. Payne, Comptroller, which shows that $225,985,152.40 have been paid for rental and benefit for cotton; $163,592,147.41 for wheat; $33,573,077.23 for tobacco; $293,354,931.17 for corn-hogs—these being listed together—$10,885,917.87 for sugar.

Those are rental and benefit items. Then for the removal of surplus, and so forth, of hogs, wheat, dairy products, cattle, sheep, and goats, seeds, sugar, peanuts, rice, and cotton tax-exemption certificates, the total amount is $225,430,069.48; so that the total expenditures, as stated, amount to $1,001,596,291.48.

Mr. President, I shall have more to say in regard to some of the provisions of this bill before the discussion upon the bill shall be concluded.

I desire to read a few paragraphs from a pamphlet, Revised A. A. A. Amendments.

I should like to read the following:

The bill, H. R. 8492, revised from earlier drafts to meet legal points raised as a result of the Supreme Court's decision in the Schechter case invalidating codes under the National Industrial Recovery Act, represents both a confession of the unconstitutionality of the present law and an attempt to postpone as long as possible a verdict by the highest court.

Provisions of the bill which embody specific admissions of the invalidity of the existing statute include the following:

1. Enactment of present rates of processing taxes in lieu of an existing undue delegation of blanket power to the Secretary of Agriculture.

2. Retroactive ratification of the assessment and collection of nearly $900,000,000 in processing taxes.

3. A prohibition against the bringing of suits for refunds or credits of processing taxes on the ground of their invalidity.

4. A prohibition against suits to enjoin the collection of processing taxes or to obtain a declaratory judgment in connection with them.

5. Repeal of the present general authority to the Secretary of Agriculture with respect to rental or benefit payments to producers and substitution of lengthy new language setting forth methods and policies in detail.

6. Repeal of the present licensing section and substitution of new language authorizing the issuance of "orders" applicable to processors and other handlers of a restricted list of agricultural commodities.

I may say in passing that the word "orders" is as much abhorred as the word "licenses", and is just as offensive to provisions of constitutional authority and right as is the word "licenses." In other words, the word "orders" means "licenses", and it is proposed under this bill to license processors as well as producers and others; and the word "others" is susceptible of a multitude of interpretations. It may mean the man who produces and sells some of his products. He may be a producer and a processor, a vendor or a vendee, and he is to be subject to orders, which means, of course, to licensing. I read further:

7. Nominal restriction of orders and marketing agreements to interstate commerce, but in language designed to make possible continued control of a considerable volume of intrastate business.

* * * * * * *

Under a mass of verbiage is concealed a recognition of the complete demolition of the A. A. A. by the Schechter case decision. Scarcely anything of importance was left in the act within constitutional bounds, judging from the repeal of virtually all important sections and substitution of entirely new language. The bill bears little resemblance in text either to the present law or to the earlier drafts of amendments to the act which have been before the Congress throughout the present session.

In effect, the bill conveys an admission that the entire A. A. A. structure is unconstitutional. Nevertheless it is attempted to validate everything that has been done and to continue the same regimentation of agriculture without substantial change. The draftsmen who drew the original act failed to make it conform to the Constitution. It is now proposed to try a different set of legal phrases to accomplish the same purposes.

While in some particulars the powers of the Secretary of Agriculture are strengthened as contemplated by the earlier bills, it is obvious that the immediate objective now is to delay a final determination of the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act by the Supreme Court.

* * * * * * *

The pending legislation has had a remarkable history. H. R. 8492 is the fifth draft of the bill actually introduced in the House during the present session. An even earlier draft, different from any of the five, was offered in the 1934 session of the Congress.

Each time the bill has been revised it has been expanded. The 1934 version consisted of only about eight pages. It was sidetracked after protests were voiced against its far-reaching character. H. R. 5585, introduced on February 12, 1935, consisted of 10 pages. H. R. 7088, introduced on March 28, and H. R. 7713, introduced on April 24, each contained about 20 pages. H. R. 8052, introduced on May 14, had 23 pages. H. R. 8492, introduced on June 14, less than 3 weeks following the decision of the Supreme Court in the Schechter case, has 53 pages.

Mr. President, the bill now before us contains 80 pages. As stated by me a short time ago, if we had another draft, it would pass the century mark. I read further:

Several of the drafts were actually reported to the House, the bills being withdrawn for reconsideration as new developments occurred.

The substitution of H. R. 8492 for the previous draft, which was less than half as long, took place upon the recommendation of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Not the consumers, not the people, but the Secretary of Agriculture.

It was reported to the House one day after its introduction.

I might say that the standing vote as announced by the Speaker was 168 to 52. The 220 Members thus shown to have voted represented only slightly more than a quorum of the Membership, which amounts to 435.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not a fact that there are several cases pending before the Supreme Court raising the question as to the constitutionality of the provisions of the A. A. A.?

Mr. KING. I am not sure, although I have a list here of all the cases pending, but I have not had time to examine it, and I do not know whether any of the cases on the list have reached the Supreme Court.

Mr. WALSH. I understand there are several cases which raise serious question as to the constitutionality of the processing tax, and also as to the licensing provisions of the A. A. A., and that these cases are likely to be heard next winter.

Mr. KING. There are a number of decisions in the district courts and, as I am advised, in the circuit courts of appeals, challenging the validity of the act in the respects referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. In view of that fact, does not the Senator think that we should postpone any action on this measure at the present time.

Mr. KING. Of course, but the Senator knows what the result of any effort to postpone consideration would be.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I desire to give notice of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in subsection (B) on page, 40, including subsections under subsection (B); that is, the subsections marked "(i)" and "(ii)", going over to page 41. I will undertake to bring the motion up tomorrow. I am giving this notice after consultation with the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in view of all the circumstances I think it might be well for us to take a recess at this time; but I wish to make an observation. I hope that we may be able to conclude the consideration of the bill tomorrow. Every Member of the Senate is familiar with all the terms of the bill, and I trust the lengthy speeches have all been made and that we may proceed to vote tomorrow on the amendments which have been passed over. I plead with Senators to cooperate with the committee. Let us conclude the consideration of the bill.

I ask the leader on this side whether it is now desired to have an executive session.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE EXTENSIBLE BUILDING

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 3192 may be considered at this time. There is a reason for its present consideration, as failure to pass the bill is interfering with the completion of a building well known to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Clerk will read the bill by title.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill (S. 3192) to increase the limit of cost for the Department of Agriculture Extensible Building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I desire to know what the bill is.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the bill provides for an increase in the limit of cost of the building referred to from $12,800,000 to $13,150,000. The building is the Department of Agriculture Extensible Building.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I shall have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the House bill in regard to the T. V. A.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933, which was read twice by its title.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, Senators will remember that the Senate passed Senate bill 2357, which went to the House; but the House passed a House bill on the same subject very much like the Senate bill. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill be considered and amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator think we ought to have a chance to examine it?

Mr. NORRIS. I am going to ask that it go to conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, my attention was distracted for the moment, and I did not hear the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 8632, which is known as the "T. V. A. measure", for the purpose, as the Chair understands, of amending the House bill by substituting the Senate bill, and to send it to conference.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, one moment. I do not wish to stand in the way of action on this measure. However, I should like to confer for a moment with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] before action is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8632) to amend an act entitled "An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama; and for other purposes", approved May 18, 1933.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I move to amend the House bill by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the text of Senate bill 2357, as heretofore passed by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That subdivision (1) of section 4 of the act entitled 'An act to improve the navigability and to provide for the flood control of the Tennessee River; to provide for reforestation and the proper use of marginal lands in the Tennessee Valley; to provide for the agricultural and industrial development of said valley; to provide for the national defense by the creation of a corporation for the operation of Government properties at and near Muscle Shoals in the State of Alabama, and for other purposes', approved May 18, 1933, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto the following proviso: 'Provided, That nothing contained herein or elsewhere in this act shall be construed to deprive the Corporation of the rights conferred by the act of February 26, 1931 (46 Stat. 1422, ch. 307, secs. 1 to 5, inclusive), as now compiled in section 258a to 258e, inclusive, of title 40 of the United States Code.'

"SEC. 2. That subdivision (j) of said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'(j) Shall have power to construct such dams, and reservoirs, in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, as in conjunction with Wilson Dam, and Norris, Wheeler, and Pickwick Landing Dams, now under construction, will provide a 9-foot channel in the said river and maintain a water supply for the same, from Knoxville to its mouth, and will best serve to promote navigation on the Tennessee River and its tributaries and control destructive flood waters in the Tennessee and Mississippi River drainage basins; and shall have power to acquire or construct power houses, power structures, transmission lines, navigation projects, and incidental works in the Tennessee River and its tributaries, and to unite the various power installations into one or more systems by transmission lines.'

"SEC. 3. That said section 4 of said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new subdivision, (k), at the end of said section as follows:

"'(k) At any time before the expiration of 5 years from the date when this section, as amended, becomes law may in the name of and as agent for the United States and subject to approval of the President, dispose of any of such real property as in the judgment of the Board may be no longer necessary in carrying out the purposes of this act.'

"SEC. 4. That subdivision (c) of section 5 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'(c) To cooperate with National, State, district, or county experimental stations or demonstration farms, with farmers, landowners, and associations of farmers or landowners, for the use of new forms of fertilizer or fertilizer practices during the initial or experimental period of their introduction, and for promoting the prevention of soil erosion by the use of fertilizers and otherwise. The Board is also authorized to experiment in the production of chemicals and other modes and methods for the extermination of noxious weeds and the destruction of plants injurious to agriculture.'

"SEC. 5. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 9 of said act, as follows:

"'SEC. 9a. The Board is hereby directed in the operation of any dam or reservoir in its possession and control, to regulate the stream flow primarily for the purposes of promoting navigation and controlling floods. So far as may be consistent with such purposes, the Board is authorized to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy at any such dam, for the use of the Corporation and for the use of the United States or any agency thereof, and the Board is further authorized, whenever an opportunity is afforded, to provide and operate facilities for the generation of electric energy in order to avoid the waste of water power, to transmit and market such power as in this act provided, and, thereby, so far as may be practicable, to assist in liquidating the cost or aid in the maintenance of the projects of the Authority.'

"SEC. 6. That section 10 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding thereto a proviso as follows: 'Provided further, That the Board is authorized to include in any contract for the sale of power such terms and conditions, including resale rate schedules, and to provide for such rules and regulations as in its judgment may be necessary or desirable for carrying out the purposes of this act, and in case the purchaser shall fail to comply with any such terms and conditions, or violate any such rules and regulations, said contract may provide that it shall be voidable at the election of the Board: Provided further, That in order to supply farms and small villages with electric power directly from its transmission lines as contemplated by this section, the Board in its discretion shall have power to acquire existing transmission lines and facilities: And provided further, That the terms "States", "counties", and "municipalities" as used in this act shall be construed to include the public agencies of any of them unless the context requires a different construction.'

"SEC. 7. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding a new section after section 12 of said act, as follows:

"'SEC. 12a. In order (1) to make possible the disposition of the surplus power of the Corporation according to the policies set forth in this act; (2) to give effect to the priority herein accorded to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations in the purchase of such power by enabling them to acquire facilities for the distribution of such power; and (3) at the same time to preserve existing distribution facilities as going concerns and avoid duplication of such facilities, the Board is authorized to acquire, within transmission distance from any dam where such power is generated by the Corporation, (a) existing distribution facilities and incidental works, including generating plants, and (b) interconnecting transmission lines, or to acquire any interest in such facilities, incidental works, and lines, and to dispose of them to States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations. No such distribution facilities and incidental works or interest therein shall be acquired by the Board unless in its judgment it shall appear practicable so to dispose of the same. It shall be the duty of the Board to use all reasonable diligence to negotiate contracts upon such terms and conditions as in its judgment may be reasonable, just, and equitable with States, counties, municipalities, and nonprofit organizations for the transfer to them of distribution facilities, incidental works, or any interest therein acquired by the Board, and for the sale of surplus power of the Corporation for distribution through such facilities. If at the expiration of 5 years from the date of the acquisition of any such distribution facilities, incidental works, or interest therein the Board shall have found it impracticable or inadvisable to make the transfer herein contemplated, it shall make a full report of the facts to the Congress of the United States, together with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate. Pending such transfer, the Board is authorized to operate, maintain, and improve such facilities and incidental works for the sale and distribution of electricity and to make such contracts, rules, and regulations in connection with such sale and distribution as in its judgment may be reasonable, just, and equitable.'

"SEC. 8. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding to section 14 of said act the following:

"'For the purpose of accumulating data useful to the Congress in the formulation of legislative policy in matters relating to the generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies, and to the public, the Board shall keep complete accounts of its costs of generation, transmission, and distribution of electric energy and shall keep a complete account of the total cost of generating, transmission, and distribution facilities constructed or otherwise acquired by the Corporation and a description of the major components of such costs according to the uniform system of accounting for public utilities as accepted by the Bureau of Internal Revenue, together with records of such other physical data and operating statistics as may be helpful in determining the actual cost and value of services, and the practices, methods, facilities, equipment, appliances, and standards and sizes, types, location, and geographical and economic integration of plants and systems best suited to promote the public interest, efficiency, and the wider and more economical use of electric energy. Such data shall be reported to the Congress by the Board from time to time with appropriate analyses and recommendations, and, so far as practicable, shall be made available to the Federal Power Commission and other Federal and State agencies which may be concerned with the administration of legislation relating to the generation, transmission, or distribution of electric energy.'

"SEC. 9. That section 15 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 15. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation is authorized to issue bonds not to exceed in the aggregate $100,000,000 outstanding at any one time, which bonds may be sold by the Corporation to obtain funds for acquiring any property which may be acquired under section 12a of this act, or exchanged as hereinafter provided, in order to acquire any property which may be acquired under said section 12a. Such bonds shall be in such forms and denominations, shall mature within such periods not more than 50 years from the date of their issue, may be redeemable at the option of the Corporation before maturity in such manner as may be stipulated therein, shall bear such rates of interest not exceeding 3½ percent per annum, shall be subject to such terms and conditions, shall be issued in such manner and amount, and sold at such prices, or exchanged for such property or such interest in property, including stocks, bonds, or other securities, as may be prescribed by the Corporation, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That such bonds shall not be sold or exchanged at such prices or on such terms as to afford an investment yield to the holders in excess of 3½ percent per annum: Provided further, That such bonds shall be exchanged for property only at a price or on terms which in the judgment of the Board is fair and equitable. Such bonds shall be fully and unconditionally guaranteed both as to interest and principal by the United States, and such guaranty shall be expressed on the face thereof, and such bonds shall be lawful investments, and may be accepted as security, for all fiduciary, trust, and public funds, the investment or deposit of which shall be under the authority or control of the United States or any officer or officers thereof. In the event that the Corporation should not pay upon demand, when due, the principal of, or interest on, such bonds, the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay to the holder the amount thereof, which is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and thereupon to the extent of the amount so paid the Secretary of the Treasury shall succeed to all the rights of the holders of such bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, is authorized to purchase any bonds issued hereunder, and for such purpose the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to use as a public-debt transaction the proceeds from the sale of any securities hereafter issued under the Second Liberty Bond Act, as amended, and the purposes for which securities may be issued under such act, as amended, are extended to include any purchases of the Corporation's bonds hereunder. The Secretary of the Treasury may, at any time, sell any of the bonds of the Corporation acquired by him under this section. All redemptions, purchases, and sales by the Secretary of the Treasury of the bonds of the Corporation shall be treated as public-debt transactions of the United States. With the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Corporation shall have power to purchase such bonds in the open market at any time and at any price. No bonds shall be issued hereunder to provide funds or bonds necessary for the performance of any proposed contract negotiated by the Corporation under the authority of section 12a of this act until the proposed contract shall have been submitted to the Federal Power Commission, and the said Commission shall have found that the consideration stipulated therein to be paid or exchanged by the Corporation for any property or interest therein is not excessive. When any such proposed contract shall have been submitted to the said Commission, the matter shall be given precedence and shall be in every way expedited and the Commission's determination of the matter shall be final. The authority of the Corporation to issue bonds hereunder shall expire at the end of 5 years from the date when this section as amended herein becomes law, except that such bonds may be issued at any time after the expiration of said period to provide bonds or funds necessary for the performance of any contract for the acquisition of property entered into by the Corporation, prior to the expiration of said period, under the authority of section 12a of this act.'

"SEC. 10. That section 26 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 26. The net proceeds for each fiscal year derived by the Board from the sale of power and any of the products manufactured by the Corporation, and from any other activities of the Corporation, including the disposition of any real or personal property, after deducting the cost of operation, maintenance, depreciation, amortization, interest on bonds, and an amount deemed by the Board as necessary to withhold as operating capital, or to be devoted by the Board to new construction, improvements, betterments, or the acquisition of facilities to carry out the purposes of this act, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States at the end of each calendar year.'

"SEC. 11. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding after section 26 of said act a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 26a. The unified development of the Tennessee River system requires that no dam, appurtenant works, or other obstruction, affecting navigation, flood control, or public lands or reservations shall be constructed, and thereafter operated or maintained across, along, or in the said river or any of its tributaries until plans for such construction, operation, and maintenance shall have been submitted to and approved by the Board, and the construction, commencement of construction, operation, or maintenance of such structures without such approval is hereby prohibited. When such plans shall have been approved, deviation therefrom either before or after completion of such structures is prohibited unless the modification of such plans has previously been submitted to and approved by the Board.

"'Such construction, commencement of construction, maintenance, or operation of any structures or parts thereof in violation of the provisions of this section may be prevented, and the removal thereof enforced by the injunction of any district court exercising jurisdiction in any district in which such structures or parts thereof may be situated, and the Corporation is hereby authorized to bring appropriate proceedings to this end.

"'The requirements of this section shall not be construed to be a substitute for the requirements of any other law of the United States or of any State, now in effect or hereafter enacted, but shall be in addition thereto, and any approval, license, permit, or other sanction now or hereafter required by the provision of any such law for the construction, operation, or maintenance of any structures whatever, except such as may be constructed, operated, or maintained by the Corporation shall be required notwithstanding the provisions of this section.'"

"SEC. 12. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding at the end of said act a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 31. This act shall be liberally construed to carry out the purposes of Congress to provide for the disposition of and make needful rules and regulations respecting Government properties, provide for the national defense, improve navigation, control destructive floods, and promote interstate commerce and the general welfare.'

"SEC. 13. That section 4 of said act of May 18, 1933 (48 Stat. 58), be amended by adding subsection (l) as follows:

"'(l) Shall have power to advise and cooperate in the readjustment of the population displaced by the construction of dams, the acquisition of reservoir areas, the protection of watersheds, the acquisition of rights-of-way, and other necessary acquisitions of land, in order to effectuate the purposes of the act; and may cooperate with Federal, State, and local agencies to that end.'

"SEC. 14. That said act be, and the same is hereby, further amended by adding at the end of said act, as amended, a new section, as follows:

"'SEC. 32. The Cumberland River and Cumberland River Basin shall be included by the provisions of this act, and the "Tennessee Valley Authority" shall exercise the same jurisdiction and power over the Cumberland River and the Cumberland River Basin as over the Tennessee River and the Tennessee River Basin, and all the provisions of this act that apply to the Tennessee River and the Tennessee River Basin and the Mississippi River Basin shall likewise, and with like force, apply to the Cumberland River and the Cumberland River Basin.'"

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I now move that the Senate insist on its amendment to House bill 8632, ask for a conference with the House thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SMITH, Mr. WHEELER, and Mr. NORRIS conferees on the part of the Senate.

UNITED STATES CONNECTICUT TERCENTENARY COMMISSION

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed the Senators from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN and Mr. MALONEY], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] as the members on the part of the Senate of the United States Connecticut Tercentenary Commission, authorized under Public Resolution 18, approved May 14, 1935.

PRODUCTION, TRANSPORTATION, AND MARKETING OF WOOL

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], the Senator from Montana [Mr. MURRAY], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY] as the members of the Special Committee to Investigate the Production, Transportation, and Marketing of Wool, authorized by Senate Resolution 160.

INVESTIGATION OF LOBBYING ACTIVITIES

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], and the Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] as the members of the Special Committee to Investigate Lobbying Activities, authorized by Senate Resolution 165.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters, which were ordered to be placed on the Executive Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no further reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

POSTMASTERS

The legislative clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that nominations of postmasters on the calendar be confirmed en bloc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered and the nominations are confirmed en bloc. That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate, in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, July 12, 1935, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1935

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O God, the source of all wisdom, purity, and power, speak to us that we may be guided this day. We pray that Thy spirit may come in all its fullness and possess us. Heavenly Father, come into our lives and clothe us with a fine sense of honor, with idealized love, with gentleness of manners, with refinement of tastes, with moral charm, and with the beauty of excellence. Most gladly may we glory in weakness that the strength of our Savior may rest upon us. Adorn and consecrate our relations with the needs of all men. In Thy holy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

The SPEAKER. The unfinished business is the vote on the motion to recommit the bill H. R. 8632.

The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. ANDREWS] to recommit the bill with instructions.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were ayes 38 and noes 90.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 102, nays 276, not voting 51, as follows:

On motion of Mr. McSWAIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—THE TENNESSEE VALLEY AUTHORITY

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, since the original Tennessee Valley Act—Muscle Shoals bill—was passed in 1933 much has happened in its administration of which I do not approve. The apparent disregard of Congress and the Constitution of the United States by those in charge has been such as to dampen confidence.

There is a lack of candor in its administration which impresses me very unfavorably. The original House bill advertised the project chiefly as one for the production of fertilizer to replenish worn-out farm lands. But fertilizer has not been produced. Instead, Tennessee Valley Authority has gone into the business of producing electricity where there is, as I am told, a surplus of electricity. This hydroelectrical development will compete with coal produced in Indiana and elsewhere. Besides, as electricity is produced as a result of subsidies from the pockets of the taxpayers of the Nation, the project will inevitably seek industries to leave Indiana and elsewhere and settle there. It has been charged that their agents have secretly been soliciting factories north of the Ohio River to close their doors and move into the Tennessee Valley. That has been denied.

I do not know who is telling the truth. But the inevitable tendency will be to do that very thing. In fact, one of the directors of T. V. A. has practically admitted this in public addresses, for example:

> Although we are bending every effort to greatly increase the use of electricity in the home and on the farm, it is obvious that only a large scale industrial expansion will absorb the great pool of power which is thus being created. As we lay our plans for developing this cheap power in great quantities, it seems to me to be mandatory that we also lay plans for utilizing it in an industrial expansion program.

If this is the plan, and it is carried out, Indiana industries and our citizens will first be taxed to provide cheap electricity in the Tennessee Valley, and then industries will move there, leaving their stranded workmen behind.

However, the project has been started and is now in operation as a yardstick of the cost of producing electricity. If the yardstick is honest, and it demonstrates that private power and light utilities operating under like conditions have been charging too much, it will serve a useful purpose.

The reason why I shall vote for the present bill amending the act of 1933 is that it provides that the T. V. A. must set up a system of cost accounting to be laid down by the Federal Power Commission. This is a principle for which I have long contended. It applies the principle of the Clark-Shannon bill—S. 1—for uniform cost accounting for which I have argued for the past 3 years. This provision is our mandate that the yardstick shall be an honest one, so that costs of publicly and privately produced electricity can be measured by the same standards and an honest-to-God comparison made.

There are also some salutary provisions with reference to having their accounts audited, as are other Government bureaus, by the General Accounting Office.

The bill should go further. It should provide that T. V. A. pay State, county, and municipal taxes to the same extent as private utilities are required to do on so much of its property investment as is allocated to the production of electricity for sale to the public.

Another thing: I should like to see the Board of Army Engineers required to determine the value of the property "used and useful" in producing electricity for sale to the public as a basis for rates. Heavy charge-offs or write-downs of property investment on account of flood control or navigation make the cost of electricity look cheap, whereas actually the taxpayer is footing the bill for the electricity user. Write-downs can be as essentially dishonest as the write-ups with which privately owned utilities are sometimes charged.

It should provide further that money used for building generating plants and transmission lines for producing and distributing electricity for sale shall be borrowed on the credit of the property itself and not on the credit of the Nation. As it is, T. V. A. goes to the United States Treasury for its money at 3 percent or less, an interest rate that privately owned plants cannot hope to get.

Unless T. V. A. electricity is placed on an equality with private plants with respect to taxes, capital investment, and the cost of borrowed money, I shall reserve my doubts as to whether the yardstick will ever be 36 inches long.

This bill is not as I would draw it. But the provisions for uniform cost accounting and audit by the Comptroller General ought to be adopted.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I want President Roosevelt to have every opportunity to demonstrate through the Tennessee Valley Authority just how cheaply electric light and power can be furnished to American consumers. I want him to have every opportunity to carry to complete fulfillment this important experiment. I want him to have every facility to perfect his Tennessee Valley yardstick so that it may serve as an accurate measuring rod to determine the maximum rates that should be charged by private utilities and the exact point in the rate structure where reasonableness ends and piracy begins.

In order that the President may have absolute freedom and authority to establish this yardstick without obstacles and handicaps, I voted today to pass the so-called "T. V. A. bill"—the bill to broaden the authority of the Tennessee Valley Authority—and I voted for every one of the amendments advocated by President Roosevelt, called "the Hill amendments", which were offered and sponsored by my friend and colleague, Representative LISTER HILL, of Alabama. We passed the bill in the House in the exact form desired by the President.

The bill which we passed today and sent on its way to the Senate is a perfect corollary and companion piece of that other bill we passed in the House the other day, known as "the House holding-company bill", which is the most far-reaching regulatory measure ever enacted for the control of public utilities. The two bills fit together perfectly.

The Tennessee Valley Authority can establish the yardstick—that is to say, the maximum rates that private utilities should be allowed to charge—and the Federal Securities and Exchange Commission, under authority conferred in the House Holding-Company Act, can force the utilities to make their rates conform to that yardstick.

As the result of these two acts—the Tennessee Valley Authority Act and the House Holding-Company Act—the Federal Government will be equipped as it never has been equipped before to deal with the problem of power and utilities. The day of the consumer is at hand. These two acts together will protect every right of the consumer. First, the regulatory bill passed by the House will enable the Federal Securities and Exchange Commission to visa all proposed stock issues of holding companies, to kill off all obnoxious holding companies, and to compel all honest companies to obey rules and regulations adopted in the public interest. The Tennessee Valley yardstick will show how private utilities should be conducted and the rates they should charge to conform to the best public policy, and the authority conveyed to the Federal Securities and Exchange Commission in the House Holding-Company Act will enable that Commission to compel the utilities to conform to the Tennessee Valley yardstick. This is an ideal arrangement from the public's standpoint.

Out in Indiana we have an object lesson of what can be accomplished by wise management to bring down rates of utilities. Washington, Ind., has conducted a very successful experiment in municipal ownership. It was the hope and dream of Mayor John W. McCarty, one of the most successful mayors any city ever had. He devoted the unremitting attention of his splendid mind to it over a long period of years, and at last his dreams came true so that now Washington, Ind., is cited as Exhibit No. 1 among the cities where municipal ownership is in full and satisfactory operation. The city has been able to acquire its electric light plant, and it is using earnings of that plant at the rate of $75,000 a year to pay for a water plant, which also will be publicly owned, and the savings through public ownership have enabled the mayor to bring down the city's tax rate to 11 cents per hundred dollars. There would be something akin to a riot in Washington if the authorities should seriously propose a return to private ownership of utilities in that city.

Generally speaking, I am opposed to Government in business, and I believe in the widest latitude for private initiative, and I want to do all I can to assist honest private business, but I have no patience or charity for the utility company that takes advantage of a lack of proper Government supervision to rob consumers. I believe we should encourage private companies provided they are content with reasonable profits and adhere to ethical practices. Thanks to the timely action of the House in passing the bill regulating holding companies and this bill giving the President the authority he asks to establish the Tennessee Valley yardstick, utility pirates have about come to the end of their rope. They are face to face with the day of judgment, which I firmly believe will also be the day of redemption for the American consuming public.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I am the bearer of a message of appreciation from the grateful people of the Ninth Congressional District of Tennessee for the benefits in which they have participated, and those yet to come, through the development of the Tennessee Valley. The Seventy-third Congress was most generous to us, and I would be recreant to the trust conferred upon me if I did not express our gratitude here at the first available opportunity.

Anyone who comprehends the progressive purposes of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 and surveys the achievements already accomplished will see at once the vast possibilities of the great program, the results of which will redound to all parts of our wonderful country over the years to come. I have faith and confidence that the present Congress will not retard the work that is under way, but will carry on in the spirit of its predecessor, and will add its own incentive toward the fullest development of this valuable natural resource of the Nation.

My confidence in the soundness of the Tennessee Valley program is confirmed and my interest in its continued advancement is increased by reason of the approval of my distinguished precedessor, the Honorable E. H. Crump, whose mature judgment and uncanny foresight are unexcelled. No man surpasses this eminent Tennesseean in energetic loyalty to the best interests of the people, and those who know him, especially those who served with him in the Seventy-second and Seventy-third Congresses, will attest to his wisdom and his integrity.

I have had occasion to study various constitutional phases of the present act, and if my investigation will aid any of my colleagues in determining the prerequisite of constitutionality which should be present in every measure approved by us, I shall feel rewarded for this effort. I honor every Member of Congress who holds high his solemn oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States. We are bound by the Constitution just as judges are bound by it. It is the people's yardstick for our guidance, and if it is to be shortened, or lengthened, it is they who must change it and not we ourselves.

It is my opinion that the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933, and the bill which is now before the House, and the pending amendments thereto, are constitutional measures; and that the conversion of the water power unavoidably created by the construction of various dams on the Tennessee River into electric energy, and the transmission and sale of the surplus electric energy are reasonable and lawful means of disposing of this byproduct, pursuant to the following provisions of the Federal Constitution:

First. The power to regulate commerce, article I, section 8.

Second. The war powers, article I, section 8 (1, 11–16).

Third. The power to dispose of and make needful regulations concerning Government property, article IV, section 3 (2).

To understand clearly the applicability of the foregoing constitutional provisions, we must review briefly the historical background of the Tennessee Valley development and recount the existing operations.

In merest outline the history of the Tennessee Valley project began in 1824 with a suggestion by John C. Calhoun to President Monroe that a survey of Muscle Shoals in Alabama be made with the view of improving navigation on the Tennessee River. Electricity was almost an unknown quantity then. People were looking for easier means of access to the growing Southwest, and this river commended itself as a natural waterway. In 1827, after a survey, Congress authorized an expenditure of $700,000 for certain improvements at Muscle Shoals. In 1871 Army Engineers recommended further improvements designed to open the channel of the stream. Construction of the 11-lock canal around Elk River Shoals was completed about 1875 at a cost of $3,200,000, and from that time until 1900 other navigational changes were made at considerable outlays.

Discussion continued back and forth from 1905 until 1915 regarding additional aids to navigation and the conservation of natural resources, and a detailed survey of the Muscle Shoals area was made at an expense of $150,000.

This 37-mile long section of the stream divides it into an upper and a lower stretch where navigation is relatively unimpeded. Muscle Shoals, however, constitutes the narrow neck of the bottle. Above and below this section there is considerable traffic movement in heavy and bulky commodities, but very little traffic passes through this section on account of poor water conditions.

When the European war began to menace the peace and happiness of the American people, the Tennessee Valley was turned to as an excellent place for the development of hydroelectric power in the production of nitrogen for explosives. Linked with this war-time demand was an increasingly urgent requirement for the manufacture of fertilizer to restore once fertile lands throughout the country, and, in 1916, Congress appropriated $20,000,000 for the production of nitrates. Land for the construction of Wilson Dam No. 2 was acquired in 1917, and, by 1921 nitrate plant no. 2 had been completed. Congress appropriated $7,500,000 in 1922 to continue work on Wilson Dam and the appurtenant power plant, these projects being completed in 1925 after a total expenditure of $45,000,000. Also in 1922, Congress authorized a complete survey of the entire Tennessee River Basin, at a total cost of $1,090,000, and on the data and reports of all of the surveys, the general plans for the development of the river and its tributaries have been based. Thus, prior to the passage of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, Congress had expended a total of approximately $80,000,000 on the development, and it is quite evident that the manufacture of hydroelectric power was not the primary purpose, navigation, common defense, flood control, and fertilizer being the predominant designs of Congress, and no reported litigations arose to stop the extensive development over a period of 100 years.

Usually, questions of law are based on established facts, and it becomes necessary to know certain essential facts in order to determine the constitutionality of the functions of the Tennessee Valley Authority. These facts have been found in a pending litigation—Ashwander et al. v. T. V. A. et al. (U. S. District Court, Ala.)—and, in part, are that the Wilson Dam improved navigation over the Muscle Shoals rapids and is the only feasible means of eliminating this most serious obstruction to navigation on the Tennessee River; that the Muscle Shoals plants, including eight hydroelectric units installed at Wilson Dam, were authorized for war purposes, and that by maintaining them we have a wholesome national-defense asset; that the Wilson hydroelectric plant will provide 50,000 kilowatts of continuous electricity; that a large amount of this electric power was generated at Wilson Dam during 1934 and used in serving Government properties; that the T. V. A. is now engaged at Wilson Dam in generating the electric power being used in the operation of nitrate plant no. 2, and is engaged in the formulation of a program of watershed protection for the Tennessee River that will require a large consumption of the Wilson Dam electricity; and that profits from sales of surplus power may be used to reimburse the Government for the cost of the dam or aid in the construction of new dams.

At the time of the passage of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act the properties owned by the United States at Muscle Shoals included the Wilson Dam hydro plant and reservoir, United States nitrate plant no. 1, United States nitrate plant no. 2, and the Sheffield steam plant. These properties were acquired or constructed in the years 1916 to 1926 under section 124 of the National Defense Act to make available to the United States facilities capable of producing nitrates and other products for war. Although the activity at Muscle Shoals resulting in the construction of Wilson Dam was initiated because of the compelling necessities of war, it also marked the fruition of a long congressional attempt to improve navigation on the Tennessee River. Wilson Dam, therefore, is peculiarly a structure originally acquired for and presently serving two distinct constitutional functions.

Of course, the water power at Wilson Dam was harnessed by the construction of the dam. It is true that the energy existed in the natural flow and fall of the river, but in that form it necessarily was lost. The dam concentrates the head of water and its fall at one point, and in this fall power is inevitably created.

The market for power at the site of Wilson Dam is negligible. Indeed, practically all navigation dams are remote from rural and urban markets.

This explains the elementary fact that generation and transmission of electric energy are the customary and indispensable means of marketing water power.

It is recognized also that disposal of the water power to private parties would involve a subsidy to a private monopoly or a waste of the power, and three alternatives faced Congress when the Tennessee Valley Authority Act was passed: First, monopolistic conditions not in the public interest; second, waste; third, Government operation.

It is well known that the problem, including the liquidation of a tremendous war-time investment, has been one of the most controversial legislative issues of this century. Between the time of their completion and the inauguration of activities by T. V. A., the nitrate plants stood idle. On completion of Wilson Dam in 1925, the problem of use of the Muscle Shoals properties became further complicated. A small amount of electric energy was used to operate the locks and service the reservation. In addition, the War Department generated and sold substantial portions of the surplus powers at Wilson Dam to the Alabama Power Co., the only available purchaser at the plant. Those sales were intermittent and at "dump power" prices.

Now, with these established facts, let us consider in brief the constitutional questions involved. It is unnecessary to cite authorities for the fundamental propositions that a strong presumption exists in favor of the constitutionality of an act of Congress; the question as to the economic wisdom of a statute, or of its desirability, is a matter for the determination of Congress; and that where Congress is faced with a problem, such as that concerning the disposal of power at Wilson Dam, the choice of means is legislative and not judicial.

The Tennessee Valley Authority Act embodies the best judgment of the legislative branch of the Government for the utilization of the resources at Wilson Dam. In passing it, Congress acted on the assumption that the right to generate and sell electric energy in excess of that required for governmental uses was undoubted, and it acted in accordance with the well-established governmental practice of disposing of surplus hydroelectric power made available in the performance of various constitutional functions. Sale of such surplus had been authorized under the National Defense Act, and the right to sell was not challenged over a period of 7 years.

In the Boulder Canyon Project Act the generation and sale of fixed quantities of electric energy at Boulder Dam were authorized. Under the act of March 3, 1909, the War Department was permitted to lease any excess water power at navigation works. By virtue of various statutes the Bureau of Reclamation has been selling annually, in connection with many projects, fixed quantities of electric energy to municipalities, private interests, and individuals. The sale of surplus power from Wilson Dam, as authorized by the T. V. A. Act, is an exercise of each of the constitutional powers hereinabove enumerated, and I shall cite and quote from a few of the United States Supreme Court decisions sustaining this view.

THE COMMERCE POWER

Ever since the historic decision in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat. 1 (1824)), the Supreme Court has interpreted liberally the commerce power in order to enable the Government to conserve, protect, and improve the navigable waters of the United States (United States v. Rio Grande, 174 U. S. 690 (1899); Scranton v. Wheeler, 179 U. S. 141 (1900); Wisconsin v. Duluth, 96 U. S. 379 (1877)).

In the course of the development of this commerce power it became apparent early that "the protection and improvement of navigation is physically, functionally, and economically related to other phases of water use and control, such as flood control, watershed protection, pollution, diversion for irrigation or domestic water use, and hydroelectric power. As each of these problems has arisen, the Federal commerce power over navigable waters has been invoked to act affirmatively in certain of those fields in aid of navigation and to regulate in fields where activities of others may injure navigation." For example: Flood control—Jackson v. United States (230 U. S. 1 (1913); Bedford v. United States (192 U. S. 217 (1904); cf. Cubbins v. Mississippi River Commission (241 U. S. 351 (1916); cf. Kincaid v. United States (35 F. (2d) 235 (1929)); watershed protection—United States v. Griffin (58 F. (2d) 674 (1932)); North Bloomfield Gravel Mining Co. v. United States (88 Fed. 664 (C. C. A., 1898)); irrigation—Arizona v. California (283 U. S. 423 (1931)); diversion for domestic use—Sanitary District v. United States (266 U. S. 405 (1925)).

In 1913 a great American lawyer, the Honorable Elihu Root, declared in the Senate of the United States:

The right to sell or lease the water power or the electricity created by the water power from the increased flowage caused by a dam built by the Government in the exercise of its constitutional functions to improve navigation is a necessary incident to the performance of these functions.

In every instance in which the Supreme Court of the United States has been called upon to deal with the rights of Congress in relation to hydroelectric power at Federal navigation dams, there has been an unvarying recognition of the broad Federal power of development, utilization, and disposal. In the limited time and space I can mention only a few of these cases. In Green Bay & Mississippi Canal Co. v. Patten Paper Co. (172 U. S. 58) (1898), which involved a controversy between a riparian owner and a grantee of water-power rights of the United States over the use of waters conserved for navigation, the Court held that Congress had complete power to transfer these rights.

The right to dispose of incidental water power was confirmed in the leading case of United States v. Chandler-Dunbar Water Power Co. (229 U. S. 53) (1913). There the claimant was the owner of land alongside and in the bed of a navigable river and of the water-power works in the river. Damages were claimed for the condemnation of these works pursuant to section 11 of the act of March 3, 1909. One of the items of damage was a claim of $550,000 as compensation for the water-power right of the company in the undeveloped water power of St. Marys River at St. Marys Rapids in excess of the supposed requirements of navigation.

It was contended that section 12 of that act, which authorized the Secretary of War to lease any water power resulting from the conservation of the river flow by navigation works, rendered the condemnation a taking of private property for commercial uses, and not for the improvement of navigation. This contention was rejected by the Court, and the right to dispose of the power by lease was upheld as an incident to the power over navigation. The Supreme Court said:

> But aside from the exclusive public purpose declared by the eleventh section of the act, the twelfth section declares that the conservation of the flow of the river is "primarily for the benefit of navigation, and incidentally for the purpose of having the power developed, either for the direct use of the United States, or by lease through the Secretary of War." If the primary purpose is legitimate, we can see no sound objection to leasing any excess of power over the needs of the Government.

Let me mention one other case on this proposition—that of State of Arizona v. State of California (283 U. S. 423 (1930)). I think that this decision has settled definitely the right of the Federal Government to generate and sell electric energy at a navigation dam. In that case, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the Boulder Canyon Project Act, which authorized the Secretary of the Interior, at the expense of the United States, to construct on the Colorado River a dam, a storage reservoir, and a hydroelectric plant. An injunction was sought by Arizona on the ground that the Secretary had not complied with the laws of the State requiring approval of the plans and specifications of the structures.

The right of the Secretary to proceed with the construction depended on the constitutional validity of the project as authorized by the act. It is clear from explicit provisions of the act itself, from the bill of complaint, and from the opinion of the Court that the right of the Federal Government to generate and sell electric power was confirmed. The Court refused to enjoin the Secretary from proceeding with the construction and, in its opinion, said:

> As the river is navigable and the means which the act provides are not unrelated to the control of navigation (United States v. River Rouge Improvement Co., 269 U. S. 411, 419; 70 L. Ed. 339, 345; 46 S. Ct. 144), erection and maintenance of such dam and reservoir are clearly within the powers conferred upon Congress.

At Boulder Dam the hydroelectric plants were brought into being chiefly for the purpose of selling electric energy, no governmental use at the dam being contemplated, and all the power generated there was to be disposed of. At Muscle Shoals the Wilson Dam and hydroelectric plants were already in existence, legally created in the exercise of constitutional powers. It would seem, therefore, that the Arizona case justifies the right of Congress to authorize the commercial sale of all electric energy which may be created and which otherwise will be wasted. The decision in Arizona against California was based solely on the constitutional power to improve navigation.

If, as in that case, the installation of generators and the sale of electric energy are justified on the power to improve navigation, certainly the sale of electric energy at Wilson Dam, where the generators were installed for navigation and also for national defense purposes, will be held, a fortiori, a valid exercise of Federal power.

THE WAR POWERS

Now, let us turn to the question from another point of view—the provisions of the Constitution granting war powers to Congress. "The measures necessary and proper for carrying on war and for maintaining a national defense authorize a broad sweep of activities, and there is no general denial that the construction of Wilson Dam and the acquisition of the Muscle Shoals properties were proper measures for exercising the war powers." It is recognized also that the current maintenance of the Muscle Shoals properties in operating condition with a stand-by of an abundant supply of electric energy constitutes a valuable ally in national defense.

The war power does not expire with the cessation of hostilities. The necessity for a military organization in all its details is ample proof of that fact. In the words of a leading case:

> The (war) power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of the insurgent forces. It carries with it inherently the power to guard against an immediate renewal of the conflict and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress.—Stewart v. Kahn, 11 Wall. 493, 507 (1870).

It is not questioned that the water power in a navigable stream harnessed by the Government as an incident to navigation improvement is property of the United States. Nor has the authority to install generating equipment and operate it in war and peace for Government uses been doubted.

> Under the war power the issue becomes a narrow one—can the United States convert the unused water power into electric energy by the simple mechanical operation of opening the additional penstock gates which are not already opened to supply current for the nitrate plant at Muscle Shoals, and dispose of the wasting surplus of power in the form of electricity?

I think that this can be done.

In the famous case of McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316 (1819)) the Supreme Court of the United States said:

> Throughout the vast Republic, from the St. Croix to the Gulf of Mexico, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, revenue is to be collected and expended, armies are to be marched and supported. The exigencies of the Nation may require that the treasure raised in the North should be transported to the South; that raised in the East conveyed to the West; or that this order should be reversed. Is that construction of the Constitution to be preferred which would render these operations difficult, hazardous, and expensive; can we adopt that construction (unless the words imperiously require it), which would impute to the framers of that instrument when granting these powers for the public good, the intention of impeding their exercise by withholding a choice of means? If, indeed, such be the mandate of the Constitution, we have only to obey; but that instrument does not profess to enumerate the means by which the powers it confers may be executed.

An outstanding example of the broad attitude toward acts related to the war power is found in United States v. Gettysburg Electric Railroad Co. (160 U. S. 668 (1896)), in which a condemnation by the United States of land for the establishment of the Gettysburg Battlefield Memorial Park was upheld. That power was one of the Federal powers considered as supporting the act. It is not required that the measure adopted be indispensable in order to place it within the "necessary and proper" category. See Everard's Breweries v. Day (265 U. S. 545 (1924)); United States v. Fisher (2 Cr, 202 (1804)). Congress must possess the choice of means, and must be empowered to use any means which are, in fact, conducive to the exercise of a power granted by the Constitution.

THE PROPERTY CLAUSE

Clause 2 of section 3 of article IV of the United States Constitution provides:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

This provision contains no limitations in terms, and the decisions of the Supreme Court establish, firstly, that Congress has an unlimited authority to dispose of the public property upon such terms and conditions as it deems in the public interest, and, secondly, that Congress has a wide discretion with respect to the choice of means to make such dispositions. The Congress has plenary power to dispose of the public property to such person or persons, and for such purposes, as the public interest requires. It may make grants of public lands to railroads in order to develop adequate transportation, and to States for educational purposes. Or it may open the public domain to preemption or settlement "in order to convert waste space into homes." See Ruddy v. Rossi (248 U. S. 104, 106 (1918)); Camfield v. United States (167 U. S. 518, 524 (1897)); Light v. United States (220 U. S. 523, 536 (1911)); United States v. Gratiot (14 Peters, 526 (1840)).

The principle that Congress may adopt all reasonable means to promote its chosen method of disposition has received wide application. The Supreme Court repeatedly has sustained the power of Congress to forbid acts on private lands which interfere with the settlement or other sanctioned use of the public domain (Camfield v. United States, supra; McKelvey v. United States, 260 U. S. 353, 359 (1922); United States v. Alford, 274 U. S. 264 (1927)). The power of Congress is not limited to the mere prohibition of acts which interfere with the accomplishment of its chosen method of disposition. It is well established that Congress may take affirmative measures to improve the public property in order to render it marketable (Hanson v. United States, 167 Fed. 881 (C. C. A. 9th, 1909); Burley v. United States, supra; Kansas v. Colorado, 206 U. S. 46, 92 (1907)).

Consequently, it is plain that the water power necessarily created as a byproduct by the construction of a valid navigation dam is property of the United States, and that Congress has the power to dispose of this byproduct in order to avoid waste, or to liquidate the cost of the dam, or to make wide-spread distribution of the benefits of the power so created. It results, therefore, that Congress has not exceeded its constitutional powers by the passage of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act, and will not do so if the pending legislation is enacted.

There are many collateral questions involved in the proper determination of this expansive question, but I believe that the adjudication of all of the principal and subordinate points will be in favor of the constitutionality of this great internal improvement. It is insisted by those who oppose the extension of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act that its functions will interfere with the operation of or will compete with privately owned public utilities, and that the generation, sale, and transmission of electric energy constitute "proprietary business" beyond the permissive functions of the National Government. It is sufficient here to say that almost every State, county, and municipality, and certainly the Federal Government itself, exercise proprietary functions in addition to purely governmental functions, and that—

> It is no constitutional objection to its existence or to its exercise that the property or contracts of individuals may be incidentally affected (Juilliard v. Greenman, 110 U. S. 421, 448 (1884)).

This Nation, through its Federal Government, has sovereignty over vast water-power resources in many parts of the United States, and as stated by Franklin D. Roosevelt while Governor of the great State of New York:

> The water power of the State should belong to the people. The title to this power must rest forever in the people. No commission has any right to give, for any consideration whatever, a single potential kilowatt in virtual perpetuity to any person or corporation whatever. It is the duty of our representative body to see that this power is transferred into usable electrical energy and distributed at the lowest possible cost. It is our power, and no inordinate profits must be allowed to those who act as the people's agent in bringing this power to their homes and workshops.

I stand with the President in the application of this principle to the obligation of Congress to transfer into usable electrical energy and distribute at the lowest possible cost all of the surplus electricity produced by the Tennessee Valley Authority in the discharge of the functions lawfully conferred upon it by Congress.

I stand also with the President in his statement that:

> I do not hold with those who advocate Government ownership or Government operation of all utilities. I state to you categorically that, as a broad general rule, the development of utilities should remain, with certain exceptions, a function for private initiative and private capital. But the exceptions are of vital importance, local, State, and National, and I believe that the overwhelming majority of people in this country agree with me.

In the Tennessee River we have the most notable exception in the annals of our country and the best interests of the greatest number of people are paramount to the personal interest of any indivdual or group of individuals. It is regrettable that anyone may be injured by the action of a duly constituted authority, but it is not proven that anyone will be adversely affected permanently by the carrying out of all of the purposes of this magnificent undertaking.

Indeed the electric-power output of public utilities in the South increased in 1934 over 1933, and continues to gain during 1935, and those who analyze the probable future development with a progressive viewpoint have confidence in the further progress of the South's privately owned public utilities. It is only natural that the individual who finds himself enjoying exceptional prosperity should inveigh against interference therewith and magnify the potentialities of competition, but the high purpose of the great majority of the people, and most especially of their chosen Representatives in Congress is, and should be, the promotion of the general welfare and the securing of more abundant blessings of liberty and justice and peace and happiness for everyone.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Speaker, in the Sixty-seventh Congress I was a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and its chairman was the distinguished gentleman from California, the late Julius Kahn. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY] also served and is still a member of that committee.

We are the only two Members of this Seventy-fourth Congress who were on that committee in 1921. I mention this fact because we had before us at that time a proposition to sell the Muscle Shoals development, now known as the "Tennessee Valley Authority", to Henry Ford for $5,000,000. I helped to prepare the minority report on that legislation, and, in view of what has developed in the intervening years, I feel that perhaps I should have better played the part of wisdom if I had contributed my vote toward placing it in Mr. Ford's hands.

Much has been said of the value of T. V. A. as a yardstick for determining the fairness of power rates charged by the private producers. In spite of the lengthy and heated argument to support this claim, I am convinced that the so-called "yardstick" has a considerable content of rubber mixed with a dash of socialism.

In regard to the disastrous effect upon the bituminous-coal industry, let me present a statement by John Lewis made before the Ways and Means Committee on May 24:

> Mr. LEWIS. Obviously, the development and sale of electrical energy for power purposes depresses coal.
>
> Mr. REED. Have you figured out at all, looking to the potentialities, the number of tons of coal that it will displace?
>
> Mr. LEWIS. It is impossible to give any accurate figures on that, because we do not know to what degree these power projects will be developed or extended, how far their direct power may be transmitted, and what usage may be made in volume of that energy.
>
> For instance, the power to be developed at Boulder Dam will practically eliminate the use of coal in all of the communities in those areas of California, Arizona, New Mexico, Nevada, and Utah which it will serve. There is not much coal used in that area, a limited quantity. In itself it is not important, but such as it is, it will be largely displaced by the transmission and utilization of the power from Boulder Dam.
> With the Tennessee Valley Authority, it is impossible for me to say what tonnage will be affected or will be displaced over a certain period, because we do not know to what degree the Tennessee Valley project will be extended, or what range in distribution and power it will encompass.
> The same is true as to the Hudson River development involving the Canadian treaty, and the Grand Coulee, and the Loup River project in Nebraska, and elsewhere.
> The mine workers, of course, the men who work in the mines, rather have a dread or apprehension pass over them every time they read about the financing of a new water-power electrical development. I suppose that is human nature. The displacement of a million tons of coal annually, roughly, will destroy the jobs of 1,000 miners. The ratio is about a thousand men to a million tons, on the basis of the record of the industry. That does not take into consideration the men involved in transportation or distribution of that tonnage.

The mine workers have been told repeatedly, of course, that they cannot stand in the path of progress, that there are equalizing and compensating factors involved in this question of progress. But it is true that in the past 15 or 20 years there has been displaced about 200,000,000 tons of coal per annum by the development of hydroelectric projects, the use of fuel oil and the use of natural gas, substitutes for fuel.

In other words, if it had not been for the development of the hydroelectric industry, the gas industry, and the oil industry, we would be producing now 200,000,000 tons of coal more than we are, and would be employing 200,000 more men in our industry.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the policy of placing the Federal Government in business to compete with private industry. The new deal has accentuated this development, and Uncle Sam now finds himself in the railroad, realty, mortgage loan, power, fertilizer, furniture, and a host of other forms of business. This policy is repugnant to the average American citizen, and when he has an opportunity he will express his resentment in no uncertain terms.

Thomas Edison made the following statement in 1929, and it seems to apply so aptly to the present situation that I desire to present it:

STATEMENT BY THOMAS EDISON

We shall steadily require more power, but a great deal more fuss is being made over hydroelectric power than its intrinsic value warrants. The first and best source of power is coal. The amount of coal available is not limited, but for all practical purposes it is limitless. We can probably use coal at our present rate for a thousand years or so without any danger of exhausting our supply, and it is highly improbable that we really know our supply. * * *

The development of hydroelectric power is very important, but also it is very expensive and usually requires an auxiliary coal steam plant. Some of the best water power is too far away from our manufacturing centers to make its utilization wholly practical.

Water power is a political issue, not a business one. It can never at the best mean very much to us except as something to talk about. The monopolizing of water power is also just a political idea. * * * There is far more danger in public monopoly, for when the Government goes into business it can always shift its losses to the taxpayers. If it goes into the power business, it can pretend to sell cheap power and then cover up its losses.

The Government never really goes into business, for it never makes ends meet. And that is the first requisite of business. It just mixes a little business with a lot of politics, and no one ever gets a chance to find out what is actually going on.

Mr. Chairman, the following letter is from Mr. C. M. Ripley, one of my constituents and an engineer of standing in the electrical world. Its factual conclusions are most interesting:

SCHENECTADY, N. Y.

Hon. FRANK CROWTHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. CROWTHER: You would be amazed if you were to see a want ad as follows:

"Situation wanted: Man of all work desires steady position doing odd jobs in a household. Wages $2.45 a week. In the basement he will tend the furnace all winter, spring, and fall and tend the water heater the year round and will keep you supplied with plenty of very hot water; will turn the clothes washer and turn and heat the ironing machine, and in bad weather will dry the clothes indoors. Will keep the laundry well ventilated the year round.

"In the kitchen he will make ice cubes and refrigerate your food so well that you can go away for a week and on your return eat 98 to 100 percent of the food you left. Will bake in the oven, mix food, and wash the dishes—all while the cook's back is turned (making the beds or otherwise engaged). While she is in the kitchen will entertain her with songs and have her instructed by experts in recipes and home economics—all without the trouble or expense of radio batteries. Will tend the stove and provide fast heat for cooking, yet keep the kitchen cool in summer and well ventilated the year round.

"In the dining room he will provide cool, fast, flameless, smokeless heat right on the table so that you can make coffee, toast, and waffles, and boil, scramble, or poach eggs—all without rising from your chair.

"In the bedroom he will wake you up on time every morning, provide you morning exercise and a sun bath; will turn the sewing machine for you. In case of sickness will keep wet or dry pads steadily hot, or provide ice packs, as the doctor may prescribe. Also will heat your curling iron and hair dryer, whenever you want them.

"In the bathroom he will provide a sun bath for half a cent while you take a tub bath, which cost 3 to 5 cents.

"In general, he will light your home and keep a clock running in every room—upstairs and down; will exterminate moths, flies, ants, spiders, and all other insect pests; will operate 3 fans to keep you cool in hot weather; will keep 8 small lights burning all night for burglar protection; will light your house number so visitors can easily locate you; will clean carpets and rugs; will provide power for chimes, both for your doorbell and for one of your downstairs clocks; and will be on the job 24 hours a day."

Now, Dr. CROWTHER, that's what electricity does in my house, and the electric bill averages $9.80 a month, $2.45 a week, or 35 cents a day.

It is beyond my comprehension why the electric companies should be assailed in Washington, when in general—a national average—the rates have gone down about 36 percent since 1914, while almost everything else has skyrocketed upward!

America was the first to use vast amounts of electricity in industry. It did much to raise America's economic power. It reduced manufacturing expenses. It also raised the standard of living and standard of comfort in our homes, as well as the working conditions in our mills, mines, and factories. So I believe these indiscriminate attacks are positively unpatriotic at any time, and particularly so in these times.

The communities where electric rates are high are conspicuous exceptions, as was demonstrated in the recent report of the Federal Power Commission.

I believe that those who further encourage the indiscriminate attacks on power and light companies are functioning emotionally and not logically.

Sincerely yours,

C. M. RIPLEY.

ANCHORAGE, ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7882) to authorize the incorporated city of Anchorage, Alaska, to construct a municipal building and purchase and install a modern telephone exchange, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000; and to authorize said city to accept grants of money to aid it in financing any public works.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this is a local bill that the people up there want; that there is no obligation so far as the Federal Government is concerned.

Mr. DIMOND. The gentleman's understanding is correct, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated city of Anchorage, Territory of Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to construct a municipal building and purchase and install a modern telephone exchange, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any amount not exceeding the sum of $75,000.

SEC. 2. Before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the said city of Anchorage, Alaska, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued in the amount above specified for the purpose hereinbefore set forth shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said city of Anchorage, Alaska, whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said city for purposes of municipal taxation. The form of the ballot shall be such that the electors may vote for or against the issuance of bonds for the purposes herein specified up to the amount herein authorized. Not less than 20 days' notice of such election shall be given to the public by posting notices of same in three conspicuous places within the corporate limits of the city of Anchorage, Alaska, one of which shall be at the front door of the United States post office at Anchorage, Alaska. The election notice shall specifically state the amount of bonds proposed to be issued for the purpose herein specified. The registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as nearly as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality; and such bonds shall be issued for the purposes herein authorized only upon condition that not less than a majority of the votes cast at such election in said municipality shall be in favor of the issuance of said bonds for such purpose.

SEC. 3. The bonds herein authorized shall be coupon in form and shall mature in not to exceed 30 years from the date thereof. Such bonds may bear such date or dates, may be in such denomination or denominations, may mature in such amounts and at such time or times, not exceeding 30 years from the date thereof, may be payable in such medium of payment and at such place or places, may be sold at either public or private sale, may be nonredeemable or redeemable (either with or without premium), and may carry such registration privileges as to either principal and interest, or principal only, as shall be prescribed by the common council of said city of Anchorage. The bonds shall bear the signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of the city of Anchorage, and shall have impressed thereon the official seal of said municipality. The coupons to be annexed to such bonds shall bear the facsimile signatures of the mayor and of the clerk of said municipality. In case any of the officers whose signatures or countersignatures appear on the bonds shall cease to be such officers before delivery of such bonds, said signatures or countersignatures, whether manual or facsimile, shall nevertheless be valid and sufficient for all purposes, the same as if said officers had remained in office until such delivery. Said bonds shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of the city of Anchorage, not to exceed, however, 6 percent per annum, payable semiannually, and said bonds shall be sold at not less than the principal amount plus accrued interest.

SEC. 4. The bonds herein authorized to be issued shall be general obligations of the city of Anchorage, Territory of Alaska, payable as to both interest and principal from ad valorem taxes which shall be levied upon all of the taxable property within the corporate limits of such municipality in an amount sufficient to pay the interest on and the principal of such bonds as and when the same become due and payable.

SEC. 5. No part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose or purposes other than those specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only when and in such amounts as the common council of the city of Anchorage shall direct; and the proceeds thereof shall be distributed only for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the orders and direction of said common council from time to time as such proceeds may be required for said purposes.

SEC. 6. The city of Anchorage is hereby authorized to enter into contracts with the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act and acts amendatory thereof and acts supplemental thereto, and revisions thereof, and under any further acts of the Congress of the United States to encourage public works, for the relief of unemployment, or for any other public purpose, including the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935, for the sale of bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this act, or for the acceptance of a grant of money to aid said municipality in financing any public works; or to enter into contracts with any persons or corporations, public or private, for the sale of such bonds; and such contracts may contain such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by and between the common council of said city of Anchorage and the United States of America or any agency or instrumentality thereof, or any such purchaser.

SEC. 7. This act shall take effect immediately.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONVEYANCE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN NOME, ALASKA

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2779) to authorize the conveyance of certain lands in Nome, Alaska.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman should make a little explanation of this bill.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, as originally built, the city of Nome, Alaska, had very narrow and crooked streets. Last fall all the business section of the city was destroyed by fire. The endeavor now is to straighten out and widen the streets. In order to accomplish this it is necessary for the city to convey to the Federal Government certain odd tracts of land and for the Federal Government to convey to the city certain odds and ends of land.

Mr. SNELL. This is simply for the purpose of straightening the streets of this city?

Mr. DIMOND. Precisely.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to convey to the city of Nome, Alaska, the following-described two parcels of land designated as tracts A and B, respectively, and forming part of the Nome (Alaska) Customhouse site: Beginning, for the description of tract A, at stake no. 1 or the original northwest corner of the reservation as described in Executive order dated April 16, 1907; running thence south 70° east 152 feet to stake no. 2 or the original northeast corner of the reservation; thence south 28°15′ west 270 feet, more or less, along the easterly boundary of said reservation, to its intersection with the northerly boundary of block K of the amended portion of the townsite of Nome, identical with the southerly boundary of Front Street, amended; thence north 70°37′ west 102 feet, more or less, along said southerly boundary of Front Street, amended, to its intersection with line 5–6 of said reservation; thence north 57° west 13 feet, more or less, to stake no. 6 of said reservation; thence north 19°21′ east 87 feet, more or less, along the westerly boundary of said reservation to its intersection with the northerly boundary of Front Street, amended; thence south 70°37′ east 108 feet, more or less, to the intersection of the northerly boundary of Front Street with the westerly boundary of Federal Way; thence north 19°23′ east 150 feet, to the intersection of the said westerly boundary of Federal Way with the southerly boundary of Second Avenue, amended; thence north 70°37′ west 105 feet, more or less, along the southerly boundary of Second Avenue, amended, to its intersection with the westerly boundary of the said customhouse reservation; thence, along said northerly boundary of Seashore Avenue, north 70°37′ west 104 feet, more or less, to the southwest corner, identical with the southeast corner of the aforesaid block J; thence, along the easterly boundary of said block J, north 19°23′ east 100 feet to the northwest corner or place of beginning; and, beginning for the description of tract F at the southwest corner of block K of the amended portion of the townsite of Nome; thence north 70°37′ west 8 feet, more or less, along the northerly boundary of the aforesaid Seashore Avenue, to its intersection with line 2–3 of the aforesaid customhouse reservation; thence north 28°15′ east 50 feet, more or less along said line 2–3, to its intersection with the westerly boundary of the aforesaid block K; thence, along said westerly boundary of block K, south 19°23′ west 49 feet, more or less, to the place of beginning.

SEC. 2. The transfer of this property and its use for the purposes mentioned shall be without expense to the United States of America.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider and a similar House bill (H. R. 7893) were laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF PAGES

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 347, to provide for the compensation of pages of the Senate and House of Representatives from July 1, 1935, until the close of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand we provide for the pages per session.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Per session; yes.

Mr. SNELL. And the session is supposed to close the 1st of July?

Mr. BUCHANAN. The session is defined in the law as lasting from January 1 to the 30th of June.

Mr. SNELL. And this joint resolution provides compensation for these pages of the Senate and House during the balance of the session?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes. The next pay day for the Senate pages is the 15th of July and for the pages in the House the 31st.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. Can the gentleman tell the House whether or not the Senate has adopted a resolution which proposes to pay the pages during the interim at a per diem rate?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not know whether they have adopted such a resolution or not.

Mr. KVALE. If the Senate adopts such a resolution would the Appropriations Committee and the Accounts Committee, or whichever committee has charge of the matter, be inclined to give friendly consideration to a similar proposal on the House side?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does the gentleman mean to put them on an annual basis?

Mr. KVALE. Yes; put them on an annual basis with pay in the interim.

Mr. BUCHANAN. No; I would not be inclined toward it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 347

Resolved, etc., That for the payment of pages of the Senate and House of Representatives for the period commencing July 1, 1935, and ending with the last day of the month in which the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress adjourns sine die, there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, so much as may be necessary for each of the following respective purposes:

Senate: For 21 pages for the Senate Chamber at the rate of $4 per day each.

House of Representatives: For 41 pages, including 10 for duty at the entrances to the Hall of the House, at $4 per day each.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ABSENCE OF MEMBERS

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to announce that the gentleman from New Hampshire, [Mr. ROGERS], a member of the committee, is necessarily detained at his home in New Hampshire and was therefore unable to vote on the final passage of the Tennessee Valley Act. If present, he would have voted in favor of the passage of the bill.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BERLIN] is unavoidably detained out of the city. If he had been present, he would have voted for the passage of the Tennessee Valley Act.

SEVENTIETH NATIONAL ENCAMPMENT OF THE GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC

Mr. PALMISANO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House Joint Resolution 201, giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to said encampment, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 6, line 13, after "Columbia", insert "And provided further, That any such buildings, parks, reservations, and other public spaces which shall be used or occupied by the erection of stands or other structures, or otherwise, shall be promptly restored to their condition before such occupancy, and the said citizens' executive committee shall execute and deliver to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia a satisfactory bond with a penalty of $10,000 to secure such prompt restoration and to indemnify the District of Columbia for all damage of any kind whatsoever sustained by reason of any such use or occupancy."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MOSES ISRAEL

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 5393) for the relief of Moses Israel, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$3,500" and insert "$2,500."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERCY C. WRIGHT

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 2566) for the relief of Percy C. Wright, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Percy C. Wright, former Reserve officer, and pay him a pension at the rate of $100 per month: Provided, That such pension shall be in lieu of any pension now received from the Veterans' Administration by said Percy C. Wright: And provided further, That this act shall not deprive said Percy C. Wright of such insurance payments to which he may be entitled.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman better explain the bill.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the relief of a soldier who had the status of what is known as a "Reserve officer on active-duty status", and was therefore not entitled to the benefits of the officers' retirement law. This officer was disabled in line of duty, and it has been found that he is seriously disabled. If he were entitled to come under the Regular Officers' Act, he would receive liberal retirement pay. By virtue of his status, not being a retired officer of the Regular Army, he is not entitled to retirement.

Mr. SNELL. How many of these provisional officers are there?

Mr. McSWAIN. I do not know of any others at this time. We have to take them up one at a time.

Mr. SNELL. Are we not establishing a pretty broad principle by taking in people who are not intended under the law to come under the provisions of that act?

Mr. McSWAIN. Relief has been granted to two or three others, I think. It is a very exceptional case, and we feel that it is in the interest of human justice to grant this relief.

Mr. SNELL. Is it unanimously reported by the committee?

Mr. McSWAIN. Yes; and the bill passed the Senate unanimously with this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GEORGE ROGERS CLARK SESQUICENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2865) to amend the joint resolution establishing the George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission, approved May 23, 1928, and its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think the gentleman from Indiana should make an explanation of this bill, and I would like to ask a few questions.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes in order to explain this bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, this bill, S. 2865, which has been passed by the Senate, was reported by the House Committee on the Library. It is an emergency measure, and for this reason I am calling it up at this time.

The George Rogers Clark Sesquicentennial Commission expired on the 1st of July of this year. This bill proposes to extend the time for 2 years and requests an authorization of $50,000 with which to complete the memorial. I may say that up to this time the State of Indiana has expended between $900,000 and $1,000,000 for the site upon which this memorial is built, and the Federal Government has appropriated $1,750,000. At this time there is an additional piece of land that is covered by a gas tank and reservoir at the rear of the 23 acres. The State of Indiana proposes to buy the additional land, and this authorization will carry out the original understanding that where the State furnishes the land, funds will be provided with which to embellish it. The $50,000 will be used to embellish the ground, build walks, extend the drives, build the river wall, and finish this memorial and its surroundings as the Commission believes it should be finished. The statement that was made before the Library Committee was that this amount was necessary in order to make a complete, beautiful, artistic, and finished piece of work as they believed it should be, and with the further understanding they would seek no more funds to expend on this memorial.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman just stated this was to carry out the original program. As a matter of fact, this additional land never was included in the original program.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman did not understand me quite accurately. The understanding was that the State would purchase the land and then the Government would build the memorial and embellish the land, and I concede that it was not originally deemed necessary to buy this particular land.

Mr. SNELL. According to this program they might go just as far as they wished, and if the State of Indiana bought the land you would then ask us to improve it and embellish it.

Mr. GREENWOOD. We could not go any further than this authorization would permit.

Mr. SNELL. You could do the same thing again.

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; the statement was made before the Library Committee that this would be the final amount that would be sought, and it was explained fully to the committee—and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER] are both here—there would be no further seeking of any assistance from the Federal Government either to purchase land or embellish any land.

Mr. SNELL. Let us go back a little into the history of this matter. When it was originally presented to the House it was understood that the State of Indiana and the city of Vincennes would spend between $900,000 and $1,000,000 and the Federal Government would match that by appropriating $1,000,000.

Mr. GREENWOOD. One million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. SNELL. You have spent $900,000 and the Federal Government has already expended $1,750,000, and it seems to me the Federal Government has done its part toward this memorial.

Mr. GREENWOOD. There was no such limitation placed upon it at the time, although it is true that there was an understanding.

Mr. SNELL. It was the understanding of the House at that time that this amount was going to finish the job.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I would not undertake to say what statement was made before the committee, but I do know that at that time the acquisition of this particular tract of land where this tank is located, of course, was not contemplated.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I stated—it was not contemplated at that time.

Mr. GREENWOOD. But since the memorial has been built this gas tank stands out like a sore thumb in the rear of the beautiful memorial, and the Commission believes that in order to have a finished job, this tract of land should be purchased. So arrangements were made for the State of Indiana to purchase it, and these arrangements are being carried out; and, as I have said, the understanding in the beginning was that the State of Indiana would purchase the land and the memorial, and its embellishments would be built by the Federal Government, and this is the same theory or understanding that was had in the beginning.

Mr. SNELL. But this is not a part of the original program, and you could continue adding on to this program and asking us to appropriate money without limit.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I did not mean to convey the idea that the purchase of this particular tract was contemplated in the beginning, but it is true that in the beginning of this memorial the purchase of land was by the State and the embellishment by the Federal Government.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think that if we spend $1,750,000 against the local community spending $900,000 we have done pretty well by the State of Indiana?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Of course, the Federal Government has been very liberal about it, and I think the gentleman sees the point, which I think we all should appreciate, in building a memorial of this character, when a circumstance like this arises which prevents an appreciation of its complete beauty, through lack of a proper background——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREENWOOD. And after all, the gentleman will concede that this is a very small amount of money to finish a project of this character in which the Federal Government has this amount of money invested, and if it requires this amount to make a complete job, I believe the gentleman would join with me in thinking that it should be done.

Mr. SNELL. But, originally, you said it would cost $1,000,000, and then $1,250,000, and then $1,750,000; and I think now to come back and say that you have got to have another appropriation in order to secure more ground is going too far.

Mr. GREENWOOD. The gentleman is not quite correct in saying it was originally $1,000,000. That was the amount granted by the Federal Government and asked for in the first instance, when Mr. Luce, of Massachusetts, was chairman of the committee; but he stated with respect to the appropriation of $1,000,000 that he felt we would be back later for more money to finish the job, and later on he went to the amount asked originally and became entirely converted to the position I am now taking.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that, but there is a limit to the amount of money we ought to put in these memorials in different parts of the country, and I think we have gone too far already.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I concede that the Federal Government has gone to the extent we anticipated, but I am explaining to the gentleman and the House that this situation has arisen which the Commission did not contemplate, and therefore the work should be extended in order to make it as complete as I am sure the gentleman would like to have it, as well as the rest of us.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate there is not any use in trying to do anything in this Congress to keep down expenditures, and for that reason I am not going to object.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I thank the gentleman for that.

Mr. SNELL. If I had the votes behind me, I would object to spending any more money on this memorial.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. How large a territory does this chunk of land that is covered by a gas station cover—an acre or two?

Mr. GREENWOOD. Several acres—4 or 5 acres.

Mr. TABER. And we are going to spend $50,000 to embellish 4 or 5 acres of land?

Mr. GREENWOOD. No; that is not the point at all. This tract is down at one end of the memorial and there have to be drives and walks and a river wall constructed and a railroad switch removed from the ground, as well as various other things that the gentleman would understand if he could see a picture of it. The ground also has these tanks and buildings on it that will have to be removed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENWOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think the opposition to the appropriation of an aditional $50,000 is somewhat due to a misunderstanding of the location. Photographs were submitted to the committee, showing the beautiful memorial that has been erected. Of course, any memorial must have suitable surroundings. I was not a member of the Library Committee at the time the memorial was first proposed, and the appropriation made by the Congress, but, as I understand, the question of the removal of this gas tank was not brought up, and therefore was not given consideration as to whether or not the gas tank should be removed in order to make the surroundings attractive.

Now that it is nearly completed, or practically completed, how can you leave the unfinished landscape gardening proposition out?

Mr. SNELL. What are you going to do with the gas tank?

Mr. TREADWAY. I appreciate the efforts of the gentleman from New York to economize and I join with him in it, but since the Government has gone thus far in cooperation with the State you do not want that sore thumb sticking up near this beautiful monument. Whether it was right to have it originally or not is not the question involved. There is assurance here that this is the final request for aid from the Federal Government and will secure proper surroundings for a beautiful structure.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. GREENWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for 5 minutes more.

Mr. LUDLOW. I ask that the gentleman from Indiana have 5 additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. YOUNG. I object. There has been too much time expended on this now.

Mr. TABER. I object.

EXPLANATION

Mr. McCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent during the roll call on H. R. 8132. I was called from the Chamber, but if I had been here I would have voted "aye."

BADGE OF THE AMERICAN LEGION

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4410) granting a renewal of Patent No. 54296, relating to the badge of the American Legion.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman from California explain what this is?

Mr. KRAMER. This is simply a renewal of the patent on the emblem used by the American Legion. It has been used by the Legion ever since 1919. This is a renewal of their patent rights.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, That a certain design patent issued by the United States Patent Office of date of December 9, 1919, being Patent No. 54296, is hereby renewed and extended for a period of 14 years from and after the date of approval of this act, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to the same, being generally known as "the badge of the American Legion."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BADGE OF THE AMERICAN LEGION AUXILIARY

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4413) granting a renewal of Patent No. 55398, relating to the badge of the American Legion Auxiliary.

This is the same kind of a bill, but it pertains to the American Legion Auxiliary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a certain design patent issued by the United States Patent Office of date June 1, 1920, being patent no. 55398, is hereby renewed and extended for a period of 14 years from and after the date of approval of this act, with all the rights and privileges pertaining to the same, being generally known as "the badge of the American Legion Auxiliary."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE PUBLIC-UTILITY BILL

Mr. PETTENGILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 minutes to read a letter which I have written to Hon. Joseph P. Kennedy, of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PETTENGILL. I will read this letter, dated July 10, 1935:

JULY 10, 1935.

Hon. JOSEPH P. KENNEDY,
Securities and Exchange Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. KENNEDY: I have read with interest, even amazement, your letter to Senator WHEELER with reference to the public-utility bill which he yesterday read to the Senate, as shown on page 10838 of yesterday's CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is very evident that you did not read the House draft of the bill which you undertook to criticize.

With respect to section 11 of the House bill, you say that "the phrase 'public interest' is not defined in the House bill, thus this bill furnishes no effective standard to guide the Commission in the momentous decisions it must make", etc. As a result, you state that you cannot be "too vehement in urging upon you my feeling that this section as now drawn is most unfortunate."

It may be that a better bill can be drawn than the House bill. It may be that a better definition of public interest can be drawn. It may be that better and more explicit standards to guide administrative discretion can be drawn, but when you say that the phrase "public interest" is not defined and the bill furnishes no effective standard, you are entirely inaccurate.

I call your attention to section 1 of the House draft of the bill. Without setting it forth at length, section 1 can be summarized as follows:

Section 1 (a) states that public-utility holding companies and their subsidiaries are affected by the national public interest, with five specified reasons.

Section 1 (b) states that upon the basis of facts disclosed by the reports of the Federal Trade Commission and the investigation conducted by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, it is stated that "It is hereby declared that the 'national public interest' and the interest of investors and consumers are or may be adversely affected", for reasons set forth in five subparagraphs.

Subsection 6 states with reference to the abuses above enumerated that "It is hereby declared to be the policy of this title, in accordance with which policy all the provisions of this title shall be interpreted" (which, of course, would include sec. 11) "to prevent the adverse effect upon the public interest", etc.

The above standards and definitions of public interest were worked out after days of discussion by Mr. Beaman and Mr. Perley, of the legislative drafting service.

Let me again say that if better definitions of the public interest can be drawn and better standards can be defined, I would welcome them.

This letter is written only to make plain that the statement in your letter to Senator WHEELER that "the phrase 'public interest' is not defined in the House bill" is a misstatement of fact, which upon your attention being called to it, I would assume you would be glad to make efforts to correct.

Very truly yours,

SAMUEL B. PETTENGILL, M. C.

I have made this statement in justice to the Members of this House who voted for the House bill as against what is very clear to me is an entirely erroneous misrepresentation of the House bill by Mr. Kennedy, which has been given much publicity, and about which editorials have already been written. We used three printed pages to define the public interest, and I am surprised that Mr. Kennedy did not take the pains to read them.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. The gentleman referred to Mr. Perley and Mr. Beaman of the drafting service and the part they took in the drafting of this bill.

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is correct.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Is it not a fact that when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce considered the bill in executive session, the specific question was asked of the drafting service; that is, of the two gentlemen who were there, mentioned in the gentleman's letter, whether section 1 and section 11 were not to be read together, one affecting the other?

Mr. PETTENGILL. Yes. In addition they stated that the only hope of the bill being constitutional depended on the definition of the public interest set forth in section 1.

Mr. COLE of Maryland. Which directly contradicts Mr. Kennedy's letter?

Mr. PETTENGILL. That is absolutely correct.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

CUSTODY OF FEDERAL PROCLAMATIONS, ETC.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report and statement upon the bill (H. R. 6323) to provide for the custody of Federal proclamations, orders, regulations, notices, and other documents and for the prompt and uniform printing and distribution thereof, for printing under the rule.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, though I shall not; but I do wish the gentleman would withhold his request until after we can dispose of a matter that is pending here and which was expected to be taken up this afternoon.

Mr. LUCAS. I should be very glad to do that, and I withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker.

WAR MINERALS RELIEF STATUTES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 240 by direction of the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 240

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of S. 1432, a bill to amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as the "War Minerals Relief Statutes." That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. It is very simple and very persuasive. It is that the report accompanying the bill which the resolution makes in order does not comply with the Ramseyer rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I could go into great detail with my objections to this bill, which I and others have opposed successfully for several years, and which discussion might bear somewhat on the point of order which I make. But the point of order may be confined within a very narrow limit. In just a few words, my point of order is that the report accompanying the bill does not comply with the Ramseyer rule, and I should like to cite one precedent which I have here. This is conclusive of my position.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the point of order that the gentleman makes is a little premature, because we are now in the consideration of the rule. That point of order can be made when the bill is being considered.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. I have a precedent exactly on that point. I first intended to raise the point of order after the rule had been adopted, but if the Speaker will refer to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of June 12, 1930, he will see that that very identical question came up, in this way: At that time a point of order was made by the gentleman from Mississippi, Mr. Busby. He raised the point that the report did not comply with the Ramseyer rule. The Speaker first decided that the point of order was made prematurely, but later on the Speaker, who happened to be Mr. Tilson, acting as Speaker pro tempore at the time, held that his first impression was wrong and that the point of order could be made at that time. The decision is not exclusive, and does not say that the point might not be made after the rule is adopted, but says specifically that the point may be made before the rule is adopted.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, as far as I can see, there can be no objection to the Chair passing on the point of order at this time. I am satisfied to have the Chair rule on the point of order instead of the Chairman of the Committee. No doubt it could be raised either in the House or in the Committee of the Whole. As to the point of order, if the Chair will examine the Senate bill, he will find that the Senate bill does not amend any existing law, and if it does not amend any existing law, then the Ramseyer rule does not apply. There is no amendment to the War Minerals Act. It merely refers to it in designating what the legislation is about. There being no amendment to it, the Ramseyer rule does not apply.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. The very title of the bill reads:

To amend section 5 of the act of March 2, 1919, generally known as "War Minerals Relief Statutes."

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. As a matter of fact, that is a mere designation. The text of the bill provides:

That in any claim that has heretofore been filed within the time and in the manner provided by the act approved March 2, 1919 (40 Stat. 1272), as amended, generally referred to as the "War Minerals Relief Statutes", in which the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, under the authority conferred upon said court by the act approved February 13, 1929 (45 Stat. 1166), has adjudged or decreed interest payments or obligations to be losses reimbursable within the meaning of the act of March 2, 1919, as amended, the Secretary of the Interior shall open or reopen such claim—

And so forth. There is no amendment whatsoever to section 5 of the War Minerals Act of 1919. It is entirely a new proposition, merely designating what it relates to by that reference.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is prepared to rule.

The Chair reiterates the statement that he is inclined to think that this point is raised prematurely, because the matter immediately before the House now is the special rule which has been reported by the Committee on Rules; but, since the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON] have expressed willingness that the matter should be settled now, the Chair is entirely willing to rule on the point of order.

It is true that S. 1432 does, so far as the title is concerned, purport to amend the War Minerals Act of 1919, but the title does not govern or control what is contained in the body of the bill. We must look to the contents of the bill itself and not to the title in passing on the point of order. Nowhere in this bill is there any reference to an amendment of any particular law now on the statute books.

The Chair is fortified in his opinion by a ruling which was made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the present minority leader and a distinguished parliamentarian, who was acting as Speaker pro tempore [applause], on February 7, 1931, very shortly after the Ramseyer rule was adopted. The Chair will read only the portion of the opinion which is now applicable. The Speaker pro tempore ruled as follows:

> It has been generally held, the Chair thinks, that section 29 of rule XIII is applicable where a bill seeks to repeal or amend specifically an existing law; but when it applies to a general proposition or a general amendment of an entire statute, it does not come under the rule. It must amend the law directly and refer to the specific section of the statute that it seeks to amend or repeal. The Chair does not think that this bill comes within the provision of the rule and, therefore, overrules the point of order.

As the Chair stated, the bill which this rule seeks to make in order does not, in its context, seek to amend any particular statute, and certainly does not refer to any particular or specific section of any statute. The Chair, therefore, thinks that the so-called "Ramseyer rule" has no application to this bill and overrules the point of order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TABER. I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

[Roll No. 123]

Amlie	DeRouen	Kennedy, Md.	Robertson
Andresen	Dickstein	Lambertson	Rogers, N. H.
Bacharach	Dirksen	Lee, Okla.	Ryan
Bankhead	Doutrich	Lemke	Scott
Bell	Dunn, Miss.	Lewis, Md.	Scrugham

Collins	Hartley	Oliver	Wadsworth
Cooley	Hennings	Peyser	White
Corning	Higgins, Conn.	Quinn	Wood
Cummings	Higgins, Mass.	Rabaut
Darden	Johnson, Okla.	Richardson

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and fifty Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an address given by our former colleague, Franklin Fort, of New Jersey, before the Committee on Banking and Currency, a very able, clear, and informative address which, I think, will be useful to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. McFARLANE. Reserving the right to object, what does the address cover?

Mr. FISH. It is an address delivered today before the Committee on Banking and Currency to cover the gold-clause bill. It is a very informative statement.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will that not be in the hearings?

Mr. FISH. But it will not be published for perhaps a week or two.

Mr. TRUAX. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if Hon. Franklin Fort is not the gentleman who in 1923 wrecked the McNary-Haugen bill, for the relief of the farmers at that time?

Mr. FISH. All I can say to the gentleman is that I have just reintroduced myself the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. TRUAX. But the gentleman did not reply to my question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SABATH. Reserving the right to object, what is the request, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The request is that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] be allowed to extend his remarks and to include therein an address delivered by Hon. Franklin Fort.

Mr. SABATH. One of those banker speeches, insulting the Members of the House and insulting everyone? I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

EXPLANATION OF VOTE

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, during the vote on the T. V. A. I was unavoidably detained. If I had been present, I would have voted "aye" on the passage of the bill and "no" on the motion to recommit.

TO AMEND WAR MINERALS RELIEF STATUTES

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, as the reading of this resolution discloses, its purpose is to make in order the bill (S. 1432) amending the war minerals relief statute, in order to make possible the Government making adjustment with certain of its citizens upon a basis that is equitable and fair.

Mr. TABER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. TABER. The bill that seems to be available at the desk is H. R. 2077, and that seems also to be the report that is available. I wonder if there is a House report on the Senate bill and if the Senate bill is available, or if there is any difference between the House and the Senate bills?

Mr. COX. The Senate bill is identical with the House bill.

Mr. BLANTON. There is a House report printed, on the Clerk's desk. The House and Senate bills are identical.

Mr. TABER. With reference to the Senate bill?

Mr. HANCOCK of New York. With reference to the House bill. The House report is on the House bill.

Mr. COX. The House bill and the Senate bill are in identical language.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. During the first 6 months of the session when the gentleman from Georgia is fresh and is not worked down, like all of us are just now, I follow him on all of his actions, for his judgment is sound, but this is a bill that comes up during the seventh strenuous month of this strenuous session when we are all worked down, having been subjected to a constant grind.

The Secretary of the Interior has sent to the committee an adverse report on this bill and has stated that he does not think it ought to be passed. It involves $1,250,000 of the people's money to pay interest added way back to 1918, when these claimants have already been paid their principal and are not justly entitled to one dollar more. Was the gentleman from Georgia exercising his usual acumen in passing on these matters during this seventh month of the session?

Mr. COX. Let me say to my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that I regard him to be one of the most valuable men who has served in Congress during the 11 years I have been a Member.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, and he already knows that I deem him one of the ablest and most valuable Members with whom I have had the honor to serve in this House, and usually I follow him when he takes a position on this floor.

Mr. COX. In protecting the Government against bad claims, I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has been worth many times his weight in gold to the country; but I would say to the gentleman, knowing him as I do, that I am confident if he understood this bill in detail he would be for it.

Mr. Speaker, I am at a tremendous disadvantage in trying to represent the Committee on Rules in presenting this resolution. I had hoped it might be possible the House would be willing to accept the rule without any considerable debate. There is no demand for time on the part of the minority. The rule has been twice reported by the Rules Committee after long and careful consideration, and it makes provision for the consideration of a bill that has been twice passed by the Senate and twice reported out by the House committee. Now, in accommodating the necessities of my case, if you might find yourselves so disposed, I believe you would at the same time be accommodating the convenience of the membership in not resisting the adoption of the rule; and I trust you will not resist it, but that it may pass without any consumption of time in debate. Then you may test the proposal in the consideration of the bill when it comes up if you adopt the rule.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. TABER. This is practically the same bill that was brought up on June 16, 1934, is it not?

Mr. COX. Yes; it is.

Mr. TABER. The resolution at that time provided for its consideration, and after the resolution had been under consideration for a considerable time the bill was withdrawn by unanimous consent.

Mr. COX. That was because of the request of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee. The gentleman will recall that McSWAIN made the disclosure to the House at that time that his committee was investigating charges that had been made against certain individuals involving their manner of handling some of these claims. The Military Affairs Committee did make some investigation of the claims that are set out in the bill. The gentleman from South Carolina states that he found nothing wrong with them, that they are clean, and that he is supporting the bill.

Now, may I not appeal to you, my friends, to support the rule and then if you want to vote against the bill after considering the bill on its merits, you will take that position and cast that vote.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Georgia will permit, I should just like to reemphasize what the gentleman from New York has said and what the gentleman from Georgia has said, that the bill made in order by the pending resolution has already passed the Senate twice. It has been reported out by the House twice, and at the last session of Congress a rule was granted for its consideration. The rule was adopted by the House, the bill was brought up for consideration with, I think I may say, very fair prospects of favorable action by the House. During its consideration the statement was made by someone that an investigation then under way by the Military Affairs Committee had reflected very adversely on the sincerity, the integrity, and the merits of this legislation; and it was just like the case of giving a dog a bad name.

We had no opportunity then, while the bill was under consideration, to go into that. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN], Chairman of the Military Affairs Committee, said that the matter was under the consideration of that committee, and that he really thought the House ought to defer further consideration until the Military Affairs Committee had gone into it. Feeling that retreat at that time was strategic, we withdrew the bill. The Military Affairs Committee has gone into it carefully. They have found nothing whatever that in any way reflected upon this bill or its merits. The bill has been reported out again by the House committee, another rule has been granted for its consideration, and there is no reason why it should not be considered. The position of the gentleman from Georgia is well taken, that the House ought now to be willing, without further ado, to adopt the rule and go to the merits of the bill, letting whatever controversy there is come up on the merits of the bill.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Georgia yield that I may ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PITTENGER. It subsequently proved that there was no substantiation for the statements made on the floor.

Mr. WOODRUM. No; and the gentleman from South Carolina will substantiate that, I am sure, during the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. MILLARD. Has the Secretary of the Interior changed his views in regard to the Senate bill?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes. If the gentleman from Georgia will yield, I would call the gentleman's attention to the statement of the War Minerals Commissioner to clarify the point raised by the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In testifying before the committee, the War Minerals Commissioner said this—and bear in mind the Secretary's report urges us not to enact this bill into law. Listen to this:

Mr. SOMERS. Commissioner, as I read this letter, the objection raised by the Secretary of the Interior does not lie so much against the merits of this particular case, as it might open up the possibility of 161 cases now pending in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia making the same claim, and undoubtedly in that 161 cases not all of them are as meritorious as this particular one.

Do you suppose that is the real objection he has to this legislation?

Mr. FERTICH. The real objection to the bill is simply the appropriation of this money at this session of Congress.

Mr. SOMERS. At this session of Congress; why do you say this session of Congress?

Mr. FERTICH. That is when the bill applies.

Mr. VINSON. Then the real objection to the bill is that the Department of the Interior does not desire to ask for money to settle these claims at this time?

Mr. FERTICH. Under the theory that it is inconsistent with the administration's present economy program.

Mr. VINSON. The merits of the case have not caused you to reach any adverse decision, but the only hesitancy is that you have to ask Congress to appropriate money to settle these claims.

Now, those are the views of the Secretary. The only objection that the Department had against this bill was the appropriation of money when the economy program was in force.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KVALE. May I say that I have given some study to this measure because of previous statements, but I intend to support the measure if and when the House considers it. Does not the gentleman believe that it is a justifiable plea to ask that the House adopt a rule allowing for a fair consideration of a measure of this kind?

Mr. EDMISTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. EDMISTON. I should like to ask a question of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]. I got the impression from the statement made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM] that the House Committee on Military Affairs reported this bill. As a matter of fact, this bill was reported out by the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. WOODRUM. I did not mean to make that statement if I did.

Mr. EDMISTON. I do not think the bill would have been reported out by the House Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BEAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. BEAM. Is it not a fact if this bill is enacted into law, as the Secretary states here, the effect of this bill if enacted into law would be to extend the date from March 2, 1919, to the date of the approval of this act for the payment of interest? In other words, after these cases have all been adjudicated, and a decree has been entered, and after the money has been paid, the effect of this bill is to give them a license to collect additional interest up to the time of the present enactment of this law?

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BEAM] is clearly in error. The original act of 1918 that appropriated $50,000,000 authorized just compensation to be paid to these people who responded to the request of the Secretary of the Interior. On March 2, 1919, when the Congress passed the amendment known as the "amendment to section 5", it provided that there should be paid the net losses. Nowhere in the act of Congress was there any cut-off date of March 2, 1919.

Mr. BEAM. The gentleman is familiar with the Supreme Court decision as set forth in the letter written by Secretary Ickes in which he says that under the Supreme Court decision interest was not allowed. The purpose of this act, as I interpret it, is merely to pay these people interest on a debt that has already been adjudicated and adjusted.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. The object and purpose of this legislation is merely to clarify what was the intent of Congress. It was pointed out in the decision of the Supreme Court that Congress, while it sought to do a certain thing, did not accomplish its intent by the language used.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I must bring this discussion to a close.

Mr. KENNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. KENNEY. Did the Rules Committee report this bill by a unanimous vote?

Mr. COX. I do not believe there were any votes against the rule, and I may say that the committee considered it very carefully.

Mr. RICH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. How many claims are involved?

Mr. COX. I think about 119.

Mr. RICH. Is there a list available showing the amounts of these various claims?

Mr. COX. I am not sure there is a list showing the amounts. There is a list giving the names of the claimants and their locations.

Mr. RICH. What is the highest amount of any one particular claim?

Mr. COX. I think in the neighborhood of $600,000.

Mr. ZIONCHECK. Six hundred and fifty-eight thousand dollars up to April 30, 1935.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. In response to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], may I say that if he will look at the hearings he will find a list of the claimants and the individual amounts involved. There are 91 claimants.

Mr. BLANTON. If we can defeat this rule, that will kill the bill.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact there is no request for time on the part of the minority, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TRUAX and Mr. MCFARLANE) there were—ayes 59, noes 22.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground there is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is not a quorum present.

The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 131, nays 196, not voting 102, as follows:

Mr. HOBBS changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. BLANTON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected was laid on the table.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

Mr. PARSONS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution of the House of the following title, which was thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H. J. Res. 201. Joint resolution giving authority to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to make special regulations for the occasion of the Seventieth National Encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic, to be held in the District of Columbia in the month of September 1936, and for other purposes, incident to said encampment.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN LIBERTY LEAGUE

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. Speaker, I think it to the interest of Members of the House to take cognizance of the document sent to me through the mails by the American Liberty League, wherein by resolution the heartiest congratulations are extended upon my vote to eliminate the so-called "death sentence" clause from the utility bill.

The American Liberty League was founded a short time after President Roosevelt was inaugurated, and is more or less of a hangover of the Democratic convention held in Chicago in 1932. The platform under which the league is presumed to operate contains ideals and principles which seek the preservation of the American institutions, and certainly there can be no justifiable criticism of such noble ideals so long as the league in mental activity remains within that sphere and drafts resolutions and issues statements which are in keeping with those fundamental American principles. But when the league, under the cloak of constitutional democracy, seeks to push forward into controversial fields outside and beyond the scope of its original objects and purposes, the administrative body responsible for such action must assume all responsibility for any adverse criticism that may be leveled against the league.

This preliminary statement leads me up to the language and thoughts expressed in the message of congratulation. I doubt that there was ever penned a resolution like it. I commend it to the Members of Congress for careful study. I am certain that after you read and reread it you will reach the conclusion that no resolution of such brevity has ever been so chucked full of derision, approbation, exaggeration, insolence, and arrogance. Never have I read a resolution that contained such powerful inferences and damning innuendos against citizens charged with the responsibilities of carrying on the legislative and executive branches of the most powerful and independent Government in all the world.

Let me take up these charges in seriatim as they appear in the resolution. In the first paragraph the League hails with satisfaction the vote of every Member of the House who voted against the so-called "death sentence" in the utility bill, and speaks forth boldly that at last Members of Congress "have reasserted the independence of the legislative branch of this Government."

My colleagues, at first blush one would believe that here was fulsome praise being extravagantly bestowed upon Members of this House, and yet before one regards this utterance as worthy it is well to realize that the League has by inference charged us with losing our independence in all legislation upon important bills passed by the Congress before the utility bill was enacted. It is more than significant that overnight the League should become so interested in congressional voting independence. It is worthy of particular notice that the League has ascribed so much importance to our vote upon an issue where billions of dollars are involved. Obviously the resolution discussing independence and Independence Day, in connection with this resolution, leads us into the fields of research to determine whether or not there have been any Members of Congress who have heretofore exercised independence in voting upon legislation, and what position the League adopted with respect thereto.

Once upon a time there appeared in this legislative hall a bill or two which had for their avowed purpose the payment to the soldiers of the World War their adjusted-service certificates in full. As I recall, considerable importance was attached to this bonus agitation and several record votes were taken. As I recall, the legislation was so serious in financial character that the President delivered in person a veto message which made American history. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS are filled with statements by Members of this body that such legislation was the most important that had appeared or would appear for our action.

Did it take courage to defy the President upon that question? Did Members of this House supinely submit to the wishes of the Chief Executive? I doubt that there is a parallel of voting independence and courage in all of our legislative history as was exhibited by Members immediately following the departure of the President upon the afternoon he came in person and delivered his powerful and persuasive veto message.

Were members of the league in the galleries that afternoon observing these acts of independence? Were there any resolutions or manifestos issued praising the Members of the House for their return to the "fundamental principles of American constitutional democracy"? No, my friends; there was not a squeak, not a chirp, not a hum, and not even a grunt which would indicate that the administrative committee of the league had the slightest concern in the battle of independence.

If we are to believe the utterances of the league, they are only concerned in a vital principle of government. If that be true, what a paradoxical position the league is in upon these two important measures. They raise all this hullabaloo about congressional independence and constitutional democracy upon the utility bill, but upon our independence on H. R. 1 they are as silent as the unknown soldier in the tomb at Arlington.

Therefore, I reach the conclusion that all this "independence baloney" put out by the league in the resolution is a delusion and a snare. The league revels in our independence and gratitude if we see eye to eye with its members upon legislative matters in which they as individuals are vitally interested.

Let us continue to examine this resolution in the light of candor and truth. The league sets forth with boldness the following:

In the conscientious discharge of duties imposed by their oaths of office these Members have defied the most ruthless pressure exerted upon them by the executive branch of the Government and have demonstrated that there is ground for hope that we are returning to orderly constitutional methods of legislation.

I must confess that my vote against the so-called "death clause" was not in defiance of Executive pressure, ruthless or otherwise. I have never understood that Presidential recommendations on public measures were considered as manifestations of mandatory action, nor that such recommendations were notice to Members of Congress that they should abdicate from the orderly constitutional methods of legislation. Assuming, for the sake of argument, that the league rests upon a sound premise in the position it takes, it is well again to pointedly refer to the silence of the league when the President of the United States exerted some pressure in person by reading his veto message of the payment of the adjusted-service certificates. Where were the league critics of ruthless pressure upon that day and year? Did the league object to that procedure by sending out contemptible congratulatory messages? If so, they all went to the Members of the House who voted against the Patman bill. Those who stood fast and exercised that same independence of judgment and conscience which the present congratulatory message we are discussing commends were upon that occasion condemned by the Liberty League, because at that time, as now, the members of the league were more interested in material issues than independent voting, notwithstanding the present resolution to the contrary.

The fair and liberal construction of this portion of the resolution not only inveighs against pressure by Executive decree and authority but also infers that Members of Congress were besieged in person by individuals who were representing the executive branch of the Government, insisting that the will of the Chief Executive be followed by voting for the Senate amendment. This subtle, yet powerful, innuendo demonstrates how ruthless and reckless the Liberty League was in failing to ascertain in advance the true and correct facts. But, my friends, the league does not want facts. They want to play at cross purposes. They want their true reason for exhibiting so much interest in this bill concealed and misunderstood.

Let me state emphatically, and with the last degree of certainty, that during the long siege of the utility struggle no cruel or pitiless pressure was exerted upon me from the White House or any other source. Let it be understood that no human being connected with the executive branch of the Government ever discussed the merits or demerits of this bill. I entered this controversy with an open mind. It was one of the major bills pending at the beginning of the Seventy-fourth Congress, and since that time I have received hundreds of letters from all over the United States dealing with this issue. I have discussed it frequently with Members of Congress. I have read articles in the press about the same, and I have listened to the debates upon the floor of the House. And especially was I interested in the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] when he said that those who failed to vote for the "death sentence" would pay the penalty at the hands of the American people. I understood that the literal interpretation of those remarks is that those who voted against the Senate amendment would not return to the next Congress; and if that be an issue in my district, I gladly accept the challenge.

Notwithstanding all of the arguments for and against the bill, I reached the very definite conclusion that the Federal Government could ultimately accomplish through regulation what it was seeking through extermination. In addition to that, I am certain that the House bill more nearly approaches constitutionality. Whether or not the bad holding companies will be exterminated under regulation depends primarily upon the attitude of mind of those in charge of the Federal Securities Commission and the Federal Power Commission.

I now reach the portion of the resolution which is more devastating in its scope, charging the President of the United States with dictating the laws of the Nation, because, first, of his control over billions of dollars of the people's money; second, his unusual power of patronage. This is a bold and damaging utterance. It should not go unchallenged. It should be investigated. It is an indictment against every Member of Congress who has voted for an administrative measure. It implies through inference and innuendo that Members of Congress are selling their votes for a "mess of patronage", and that the President of the United States is in a wicked conspiracy with Members of Congress to control their votes by patronage plums.

Let me speak boldly again upon that phase of the unjust resolution. Let there be no misunderstanding that patronage at no time has ever been given the slightest consideration upon any vote that I have cast upon legislation during the Seventy-fourth Congress. Believe me, my colleagues, when I say that I express a mighty hope that the time will come when Members of the American Congress will be barred from dealing with patronage problems. I should be happy at any time to turn over all of my interests in the problems of patronage to the Democratic organization in Illinois or some other agency designated to carry out these administrative functions. Frankly, I should like to know more about government. Candidly, I should like more time to investigate for research work upon the grave problems which are constantly before us. Even a fair conception of government requires long hours of study and application.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I shall not object—but I should like to know for the benefit of the Members of the House what is going to be the program following this speech.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is a conference report on the desk.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Are we going to have any more rules brought up?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention to call up any more rules today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. Does the gentleman know the names of the directors of this American Liberty Bond League? The gentleman has referred to the background of the directors controlling this Liberty Bond League.

Mr. LUCAS. For the information of the gentleman from Texas, I desire to advise him I am not acquainted with the names of all the members of the league. However, in the pamphlet that they issue there is disclosed their platform and the names of the members of the executive committee.

Mr. PATMAN. Would the gentleman mind placing in the RECORD at this point the names of the directors and their business connections?

Mr. LUCAS. I have that information, and with the permission of the House I will insert in the RECORD at this point the names of the executive committee of the league and their financial and other connections.

The list is as follows:

Note: No financial connections are shown for Mrs. Henry B. Joy, Mrs. Charles H. Sabin, and Mrs. James Ross Todd.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. RANDOLPH. When did the gentleman receive this congratulatory message?

Mr. LUCAS. The message was received, as I recall, on the 3d of July.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The reason I ask the question is because my colleagues here on my left and right, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMPSON] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. ROBINSON], as well as myself, voted against the "death clause" and we have received none of these messages, and I was wondering if it were general or confined to the gentleman.

Mr. LUCAS. This came through the mails on July 3.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield.

Mr. FISH. I think the gentleman wants to be fair. He has made a very bitter arraignment of the Liberty League——

Mr. LUCAS. I just yielded for a question.

Mr. FISH. My question is, Is it not a fact that two former chairmen of the Democratic National Committee are officials of this league; and also Mr. Alfred E. Smith?

Mr. LUCAS. I think they are on the executive committee.

Mr. FISH. Including John W. Davis.

Mr. LUCAS. That is correct, as the record will so show.

Mr. SABATH. Does not the list of members also include many Republicans who have contributed to the league and furnished more than a million dollars to finance it?

Mr. LUCAS. There are many Republicans on the list.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does the Liberty League have a platform?

Mr. LUCAS. The Liberty League has a platform.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. Does not the gentleman think their platform is full of splinters and would not be safe for any Democrat to sit on?

Mr. LUCAS. I would not agree to that in toto because there are many high ideals of Americanism expressed in their platform.

Mr. DUNN of Pennsylvania. I think it would be dangerous for any of them.

Mr. LUCAS. For years the science of government has become more intricate and complex until today no man in any department has the mental capacity and time to thoroughly appreciate and understand all of the problems which arise in government every day. It goes without saying that the present emergency is primarily responsible for this condition, and the net result is that much legislation is passed by implication rather than through sound reasoning and mature deliberation. This is no reflection against any Member of Congress or anyone else connected with government. Take the holding-company bill for example. Members of the committee in charge of that bill have spent practically all of their time upon that controversial measure. That bill, with all of its ramifications, is of sufficient importance to keep every member of that committee in constant study, and to give such a bill the serious consideration it deserves from a governmental viewpoint a Member of Congress has no time to meet the many other problems which are constantly before him. Therefore I say that government needs help. America needs leaders who are skilled in the arts and science of government. It is common knowledge that the leaders of the sovereign rights of the people have not kept the pace in the advanced march of civilization when compared with the great leaders of science and industry. The result is that divers fields of governmental activities are constantly calling Members of Congress to their open forum, yet because we are busy with other matters, including patronage, we respectfully decline the inspiring invitation.

Mr. Speaker, patronage has no right to dictate the Nation's laws, and to say that the President of the United States would stoop to such an indefensible practice is as odious as it is absurd. But the message makes the charge. It comes from an organization whose roster carries some of the outstanding citizens of the Nation, and for that reason, if no other, the challenge should not go unanswered.

In the conclusion of the resolution they express high hope that the independent vote on the utility bill will mark the end of the enactment of visionary reform theories by Executive decree with the Congress acting the humiliating role of a "rubber stamp."

Here is another insidious implication that every man who voted for the "death clause" yielded to Executive pressure and therefore is automatically classed as a "rubber stamp." This, my friends, I deny and scornfully resent.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have 5 more minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. CITRON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. CITRON. Under date of July 9, 1935, there appeared the following sentence in the Washington Herald, of Washington, D. C.:

It is likely that a large, separate campaign fund will be raised for the election of a Republican House, independent of the national campaign fund.

Does the gentleman know whether or not this league is going to help the Republicans procure this campaign "slush" fund or whether this has anything to do with this Power Trust we have heard so much about?

Mr. LUCAS. I will let the gentleman answer his own question by reading this speech after it is printed, as well as examining the list of those who are in charge of the Liberty League with respect to their financial standing in this country.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I must refuse to yield further.

No man who is honorable and fair will impugn the motives of a Congressman upon any vote so long as that vote is an honest one and in accord with the political thought in which he has been schooled. I may disagree with you as to your political philosophy, but I shall not attack or challenge the mental make-up which advocates that philosophy.

The "rubber stamp" theory is being overplayed by observers who disagree with the administration's program. As I recall, some of the distinguished brethren on the Republican side have seen fit to use it with pleasure and satisfaction. The press frequently headlines the "rubber stampers." Even the "grass rooters" at Springfield had this hackneyed expression in their mental make-up when they declared in no. 6 of their list of grievances against the President that "he", meaning the President, "has reduced the Congress to a group of 'time servers.'" Digressing for a moment, let me say that it was to be expected that such a phrase would originate at a Republican conference where no Republican Congressmen were invited. It is common knowledge throughout this Nation that the Grand Old Party knows more about "time serving" in the accepted terms of the code than any other party that ever existed in America. There is a long list of political "time servers" during the last 14 years, but time does not permit me to call the roll.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks that no matter how much the league can raise it would be able to beat the four and a half billion dollar appropriation?

Mr. LUCAS. That is just the kind of a question I would expect the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask. [Laughter.]

The "rubber stamp" condemnation in the resolution in question affects all Republicans and Democrats who have stood with the President upon important measures during the Seventy-fourth Congress. I want to say this in defense of the Members of the House. I am a new man in Congress, but daily have I watched the activities of Democrats and Republicans. I have seen you cool and dispassionate; I have seen you in the moments of anger; but I am glad to observe that when the exigencies of the situation demands, the leadership on both sides of this House meets the subject matter at hand with courage, independence, and honor. These are serious days in government; these are times that test the mettle of men; we are in the throes of economic chaos; we are drifting through one of the greatest depressions in all history. The emergency demanded that we yield to many immediate measures which are destined to pull this country from the yawning chasm of fascism, communism, and socialism. And in the future to come, if I am firmly convinced that further emergency measures are necessary to save America, I shall stand with the President of the United States in his herculean task of placing our beloved America on the road to recovery.

Mr. CHURCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCAS. I refuse to yield.

In conclusion, as one Member of Congress, I resent the message of heartiest congratulations sent to me by the American Liberty League. It strikes me that they have returned a blanket indictment with serious charges by innuendo and inference against the Members of this House. In the interests of Members of Congress, in the interest of legislative independence, and in the interests of true representative government, I sincerely hope that in the course of the investigation of lobbying activities on the utility bill that those responsible for framing the congratulatory resolution upon the "death sentence" clause will be called to explain their interests in connection with the defeat of the Senate amendment.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. McGROARTY, indefinitely;

To Mr. MEAD, indefinitely; and

To Mr. STARNES, indefinitely.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, July 12, 1935, at 12 o'clock noon.

By Mr. CROSSER of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 8825) granting a pension to Mary A. Fairchilds; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CROWTHER: A bill (H. R. 8826) for the relief of Edward H. Karg; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania: A bill (H. R. 8827) granting a pension to James Y. Bowser; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PETERSON of Florida: A bill (H. R. 8828) granting a pension to Kathryn E. Fraley; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

9129. By Mr. SNELL: Petition of various citizens in northern New York, urging adoption of constitutional amendment "Except in the event of an invasion of the United States or its territorial possessions and attack upon its citizens residing therein, the authority of Congress to declare war shall not become effective until confirmed by a majority of all votes cast thereon in a Nation-wide referendum. Congress may by law provide for the enforcement of this section"; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

9130. By Mr. TRUAX: Petition of Valley Builders Supply Co., Cincinnati, Ohio, opposing the plan of Admiral Peoples, Relief Administration, which intends to purchase all materials direct from producers, as they believe this would entail expense of handling materials by the Government and would affect thousands of men and millions of invested capital in the industry; to the Committee on Labor.

9131. Also, petition of the Toledo Chamber of Commerce, Toledo, Ohio, by their transportation commissioner, opposing Senate bill 2944, which would prevent and make unlawful the practice of law before the governmental departments, bureaus, commissions, and their agencies, by those other than licensed attorneys at law; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

9132. Also, petition of E. C. Shafer, of Mansfield, and numerous other members of Union Grange, Richland County, Ohio, urging support of the Townsend revolving pension plan; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9133. Also, petition of the Young Men's Christian Association, Canton, Ohio, by their recording secretary, F. M. Broda, urging that the youth of their community, State, and Nation are entitled to immediate consideration as applicants for employment upon the Federal works project; to the Committee on Labor.

9134. Also, petition of the Young Men's Christian Association, Canton, Ohio, by their recording secretary, F. M. Broda, resolving that their organization and other private agencies whose record of service for youth has stood the test of time and experience are entitled to participate in the public-works projects on the same footings as public departments, wherever such projects are justified on the grounds of public service and public policy; to the Committee on Labor.

9135. Also, petition of Dan T. Wolfe, in behalf of many people in the Mississippi Valley whose homes and farm lands were destroyed 5 years ago by the Government engineers in executing the Flood Control Act of 1928, urging support of Mr. Wilson's "levee set-back" bill (H. R. 7349); to the Committee on Flood Control.

9136. Also, petition of the Lorain County Democratic Executive Committee, by Howard J. Cobb, chairman, urging modification of the President's $1,400 highway ruling to include the equivalent of work for one man for 1 year directly or indirectly employed; to the Committee on Labor.

9137. Also, petition of the Central Dairy Producers Council, by J. R. Smart, president, Columbus, Ohio, urging defeat of the Kleberg bill and the enactment of such legislation as will place at least a 5-percent tax per pound on all oleomargarine; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

9138. Also petition of the council and officials of the city of Wellsburg, Brooke County, W. Va., by their mayor, Charles F. McGlumphy, asking careful consideration for and favorable action on the Wellsburg bridge bill, listed as no. 247 on the Consent Calendar; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

9139. By Mr. WIGGLESWORTH: Petition of Wollaston Mothers Club, Quincy, Mass., urging the enactment of House bill 6472, providing for the abolition of compulsory block booking and blind selling of moving-picture films; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

SENATE

FRIDAY, JULY 12, 1935

(Legislative day of Monday, May 13, 1935)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

THE JOURNAL

On motion of Mr. ROBINSON, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of the proceedings of the calendar day Thursday, July 11, 1935, was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE ROLL

Mr. LEWIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum and ask for a roll call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. VANDENBERG. I again announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] is absent because of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ninety-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 2779) to authorize the conveyance of certain lands in Nome, Alaska.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to each of the following bills of the House:

H. R. 2566. An act for the relief of Percy C. Wright; and

H. R. 5393. An act for the relief of Moses Israel.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 4410. An act granting a renewal of Patent No. 54296 relating to the badge of the American Legion;

H. R. 4413. An act granting a renewal of Patent No. 55398 relating to the badge of the American Legion Auxiliary; and

H. R. 7882. An act to authorize the incorporated city of Anchorage, Alaska, to construct a municipal building and purchase and install a modern telephone exchange, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000; and to authorize said city to accept grants of money to aid it in financing any public works.

CLOSING OF MILITARY ROAD AT WASHINGTON-HOOVER AIRPORT

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter signed by Harry H. Woodring, Assistant Secretary of War; Harllee Branch, Second Assistant Postmaster General; and Eugene L. Vidal, Director Bureau of Air Commerce, being an informal interdepartmental committee appointed by the Secretary of War, the Postmaster General, and the Secretary of Commerce to study the traffic situation at the Washington-Hoover Airport and to make recommendations looking to the elimination or reduction of existing hazards, favoring the prompt enactment of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 330) to close Military Road temporarily, which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Concurrent Resolution 6

Whereas the amended United States flood-control bill, as prepared by the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army, and which is now being considered by the United States Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives, will be, when enacted into law, of such vast benefit to the alluvial sections of the State of Louisiana, and is so much more acceptable to the citizens of this State than the existing United States Flood Control Act: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Legislature of Louisiana (the house of representatives and the senate thereof concurring herein), That the United States Flood Control Committee of the House of Representatives be urged to speed its deliberations and report this bill out favorably and promptly, so that there may be no uncertainty of congressional action at this session of Congress; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the United States Senators of the State of Louisiana, the Congressmen of the State of Louisiana, and further, a copy to the Speaker of the National Congress, and to the Vice President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting held under the auspices of the American League of Ex-Servicemen, New York City, N. Y., favoring the prompt enactment of House bill 8365, providing for the immediate full cash payment of the so-called "soldiers' bonus", which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting held under the auspices of the American League of Ex-Servicemen, New York City, N. Y., favoring the prompt repeal of the so-called "Economy Act" for the benefit of World War veterans, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting held under the auspices of the American League of Ex-Servicemen, New York City, N. Y., favoring the prompt enactment of social and unemployment insurance legislation, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by a mass meeting held under the auspices of the American League of Ex-Servicemen, New York City, N. Y., protesting against the publication of an article in the New York American, on June 9, 1935, by Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., Commandant of the Brooklyn Navy Yard, allegedly advocating the making of war against the Soviet Union, and favoring the removal of such officer, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fort Scott, Wauneta, and Greensburg, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to establish a retirement system for railroad employees, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

FEDERAL TAXATION ON DISTILLED SPIRITS

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask consent to have printed in full in the RECORD, and appropriately referred, copy of a joint resolution adopted by the New Jersey State Legislature, memorializing Congress to reduce Federal taxes on distilled spirits.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint Resolution 14

Joint resolution memorializing the President and Congress of the United States to reduce taxes on distilled spirits and requesting Congress to call a conference between its representatives and representatives of the several States to consider the proper relationship between Federal and State taxes on alcoholic beverages

Whereas despite the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the enactment by the several States of statutes regulating the manufacture, sale, and distribution of alcoholic beverages, the racketeer and bootlegger continue to flourish; and

Whereas investigation and study by the New Jersey State Commissioner of Alcoholic Beverage Control have resulted in the conviction that present excessive taxes are the major cause of illicit alcoholic beverage activity and that it is essential that the tremendous incentive resulting therefrom be withdrawn to insure the elimination of the racketeer and bootlegger: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and General Assembly of the State of New Jersey:

1. That the President and Congress of the United States are hereby memorialized to reduce the present Federal taxes on distilled spirits.

2. That the Congress of the United States is hereby requested to call a conference between its representatives and representatives of the several States to consider the proper relationship between Federal and State taxes on alcoholic beverages.

3. That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and each Member of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States from the State of New Jersey.

4. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 2697) for the relief of the United Pocahontas Coal Co., Crumpler, W. Va., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1073) thereon.

Mr. McADOO, from the Committee on Patents, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment:

H. R. 4410. A bill granting a renewal of Patent No. 54296, relating to the badge of the American Legion; and

H. R. 4413. A bill granting a renewal of Patent No. 55398, relating to the badge of the American Legion Auxiliary.

Mr. DUFFY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3558) for the relief of Capt. Walter S. Bramble, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1074) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1073) for the relief of John F. Hatfield, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1075) thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 3123) to provide for the relief of public-school districts and other public-school authorities, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1076) thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED

Mrs. CARAWAY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on the 11th instant that committee presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bills:

S. 1206. An act authorizing the transfer of certain lands near Vallejo, Calif., from the United States Housing Corporation to the Navy Department for naval purposes;

S. 2230. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to acquire a suitable site at Pearl Harbor, Territory of Hawaii, for a rear range light;

S. 2378. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept on behalf of the United States a bequest of certain personal property of the late Dr. Malcolm Storer, of Boston, Mass.;

S. 2846. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to accept on behalf of the United States the devise and bequest of real and personal property of the late Paul E. McDonnold, passed assistant surgeon with the rank of lieutenant commander, Medical Corps, United States Navy, retired; and

S. 2966. An act to empower the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii to authorize the issuance of revenue bonds, to authorize the city and county of Honolulu to issue flood-control bonds, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

As in executive session,

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers for appointment in the Regular Army.

Mr. TRAMMELL, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported favorably the nominations of sundry officers in the Marine Corps.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania, to be an Assistant Attorney General, vice Harold M. Stephens, appointed Assistant to the Attorney General.

Mr. McKELLAR, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of sundry postmasters.

He also, from the same committee, reported adversely the nomination of Andrew J. Roper to be postmaster at Saltillo, Miss.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reports will be placed on the Executive Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. McNARY:

A bill (S. 3244) relating to the Oregon-Washington Bridge Board of Trustees; and

A bill (S. 3245) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River at Astoria, Clatsop County, Oreg.; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. WAGNER:

A bill (S. 3246) granting a pension and relief to Mary H. Denison; to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask leave to introduce a bill conferring upon the Administrator of Public Works the power to make compensation to States, counties, and cities in lieu of taxes in certain instances, and I ask that it be referred to the proper committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received and appropriately referred.

By Mr. GEORGE:

A bill (S. 3247) to amend title II of the National Industrial Recovery Act as amended by the Emergency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1935, and as extended by the Emergency Relief Appropriation Act of 1935; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 3248) to improve the Government services, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Civil Service.

(By request.) A bill (S. 3249) to create an Industrial Commission on Negro Affairs; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HATCH:

A bill (S. 3250) to prohibit the acquisition by the United States of any land located in any State without the consent of such State; to the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

H. R. 4410. An act granting a renewal of Patent No. 54296 relating to the badge of the American Legion; and

H. R. 4413. An act granting a renewal of Patent No. 55398 relating to the badge of the American Legion Auxiliary; to the Committee on Patents.

H. R. 7882. An act to authorize the incorporated city of Anchorage, Alaska, to construct a municipal building and purchase and install a modern telephone exchange, and for such purposes to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000; and to authorize said city to accept grants of money to aid it in financing any public works; to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. GUFFEY and Mr. MOORE each submitted an amendment, and Mr. LONERGAN and Mr. RUSSELL each submitted two amendments, intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes, which were severally ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO SECOND DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. HAYDEN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8554, the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 47, line 6, at the end of the section, to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That expenditures out of sums gratuitously appropriated by Congress made prior to the date of the law, treaty, agreement, or Executive order under which the claims arise shall not be offset against the claims or claim asserted and expenditures under the act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. L., p. 984), shall not be charged as offsets against any claim on behalf of an Indian tribe or tribes now pending in the Court of Claims or hereafter filed.

POST-OFFICE FIXTURES, EQUIPMENT, AND RENTALS

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 169), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, shall, during the recess of the Congress, examine into the matter of fixtures and equipment in post offices and rentals therefor, and all other questions pertaining thereto, the expenses incurred in pursuance thereof, not to exceed $3,000, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE IN THE COURTS

Mr. McADOO submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 170), which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That in addition to the authority conferred upon the Special Committee of the Senate to Investigate the Administration of Receivership and Bankruptcy Proceedings in the Courts of the United States, created under Senate Resolution No. 78, Seventy-third Congress, first session, agreed to June 13, 1933, and supplemented by Senate Resolution No. 72, Seventy-fourth Congress, first session, agreed to February 15, 1935, said committee shall have authority to make a full and complete investigation of the administration of justice in the courts of the United States. The Department of Justice is requested to furnish to the committee such investigators and legal assistants as the committee may require in its investigation.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION—ADDRESS BY SENATOR BANKHEAD

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, on July 11, in the city of Washington, the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] delivered a very interesting and pursuasive radio address on the subject of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, familiarly known as the "three A's." In the course of the address he said:

The public is now hearing much about the propaganda engaged in, in opposition to the utility holding company bill. It has not been informed about the extensive and wide-spread propaganda which has been carried on since this Congress met by handlers, processors, and distributors of farm commodities. Members of Congress know, however, how their mail has been filled with protests from people who knew nothing about the provisions of the pending bill, but who had been led to believe that it directly touched their business. Any investigation of propaganda relating to congressional legislation should by all means include a thorough scrutiny of the efforts made and money expended by interested persons who have been diligently striving to create adverse sentiment against the bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The identity of these persons should be disclosed and the public given full information on the subject.

Further on he said:

In my judgment, the Agricultural Adjustment Act is the outstanding piece of legislation, from the standpoint of beneficial administration, that Congress has enacted during my service in the Senate.

I commend this address to the attention of my colleagues. I ask that the entire address be printed in the RECORD at this point as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the address delivered by Hon. JOHN H. BANKHEAD, United States Senator from Alabama, over N. B. C. National Forum, Washington, D. C., July 11, 1935, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

During this session of Congress the Agricultural Adjustment Administration, familiarly known as the "three A's", has been under a steady fire from its enemies. A microscopic examination of all phases of its activities has been publicly conducted. An exhaustive search has been made to find weak spots.

The public is now hearing much about the propaganda engaged in, in opposition to the utility holding company bill. It has not been informed about the extensive and wide-spread propaganda which has been carried on since this Congress met, by handlers, processors, and distributors of farm commodities. Members of Congress know, however, how their mail has been filled with protests from people who knew nothing about the provisions of the pending bill, but who had been led to believe that it directly touched their business. Any investigation of propaganda relating to congressional legislation should by all means include a thorough scrutiny of the efforts made and money expended by interested persons who have been diligently striving to create adverse sentiment against the bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act. The identity of these persons should be disclosed, and the public given full information on the subject.

Attempts have been made to array industrial workers against farm workers. Partisan critics have insisted that the rise of prices in farm commodities which has resulted from programs administered by the A. A. A. constitute a burden upon industrial workers. Farmers have not protested against higher priced industrial commodities as an improper burden upon them. They demand and are entitled to the same consideration. Farmers realize that industrial workers need good wages to enable them to buy farm products. Everybody understands that shorter hours, higher wages, and so-called "fair trade practices" by industries have increased prices paid by consumers, including the farmers. Without fair prices, farmers, constituting 25 percent of our population, cannot do their normal part in supporting industry, and in enabling industry to provide employment at fair wages.

The welfare of the farmers depends upon the ability of industrial workers to buy farm products. Regular employment of industrial workers at good wages depends upon the ability of the farmers to pay for industrial products and services. There is a relation of interdependence between these two major groups of producers. The efforts of politicians, self-styled pro bono advisers and critics, to array farm workers and industrial workers against each other have miserably failed. It is pleasing to note that the horrible loss, in purchasing and debt-paying power during the great depression, of 30,000,000 people upon the farms of our country has brought most of our industrialists to an acute realization of the sad plight of agriculture and of the dire necessity of remedial measures for the financial rescue of the farmers. There has not been, there is not now, a complete accord on what are the best methods to accomplish that result.

Constructive criticism is helpful and welcomed by those in positions of responsibility and power. But destructive objections are obnoxious. When the Agricultural Adjustment Act was passed there were many doubting Thomases both in Congress and out. In the entire history of America no comprehensive plan had been tendered to the farmers to aid them collectively in adjusting supply to consumptive demands.

During the World War and the post-war boom period, while large credits were being extended to foreign countries to buy our surplus farm crops, cultivated acreage had been expanded by the millions of acres, machinery for more production per acre had been widely acquired on the farms, and production of basic commodities largely in excess of normal domestic requirements became the established order of things. When the cruel crash came in 1929 domestic consumption greatly decreased, and within a few years foreign trade almost vanished.

Farm production, however, continued at capacity levels. By 1932 a carry-over of 360,000,000 bushels of wheat and 9,000,000 bales of cotton had accumulated. Wheat went from $1.25 to 35 cents a bushel, cotton from 20 cents to 5 cents a pound. Corn went down to 10 cents a bushel. Six million farmers scattered over the hills and valleys, across the plains, and on opposite sides of the great rivers and mountains were dazed and bewildered. A great financial disaster had descended upon them.

A wheat or cotton farmer reasoned that all the wheat or cotton his farm could produce at prevailing bankrupt prices would not bring him over 25 percent of his former income, and his income had been entirely too low for some years. He felt that he should produce as much as was possible on his farm. He knew his fellow farmers would produce all they could for the same reason. There was no way for the millions of farmers to get together to consider the state of their affairs and agree upon adjustment programs. They had no machinery for controlling aggregate farm production, such as the United States Steel and other industrial corporations have through their stockholders and boards of directors and executive officers for the control of their production.

While industry discharged millions of employees and caused them to go on public relief rolls in order to adjust supply to demand, the farmers continued to toil long hours, producing the full capacity of the farms, and selling their year's yield at poverty prices.

Landlords, out of a spirit of loyalty and faithfulness to their tenants, continued to advance to them the credit and equipment necessary to make crops. Many farms were under mortgage when the depression started, and mortgages were placed upon many other farms. As a necessary condition for keeping the farms in operation, this wide-spread financial difficulty applied both to farms occupied by their owners and farms occupied by tenants. Everywhere in the agricultural sections newspapers were filled with notices of foreclosures, and as a result many thousands of farmers who owned their farms were translated into tenants, while thousands of landlords lost their farms.

With conditions so alarming, it is not strange that an agrarian revolt was in evidence in many sections. The Government, through the Farm Credit Agency, saved for the owners several hundred thousand farms through new credit facilities with a lower rate of interest and at generously protracted installment payments.

It was recognized, however, that pay day must come. With the prevailing prices of farm commodities, the day of reckoning was merely being postponed. The fundamental thing to do was to bring about, if possible, an increase in farm prices comparable with the prices of industrial commodities, or, expressed in other words, to arrange for parity prices.

As the result of such a change in the earning power of the farmers, it was plain that the farmers would be advanced to a position where it could be reasonably expected they would meet their obligations.

This administration was convinced from the beginning that the depression could not be overcome until agriculture, constituting such a large part of the consumers of America, had been financially rescued.

Then came the passage of the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and with it the dawning of a new and better day for American agriculture. Machinery was provided for effective cooperative programs by producers of the basic commodities through crop adjustments and for the producers of specialty crops through marketing agreements. There was much resistance to the passage of this act. It was new in the domain of legislation and of practical administration. I recall that some of my colleagues in the Senate who voted for it did so with great reluctance. Others could not see their way clear to vote for the bill. There existed a feeling that farmers, notoriously individualistic, would not cooperate in voluntary adjustment plans in sufficient numbers to accomplish the desired results.

There was fear of too much opposition from those for whose welfare it was intended. Some of these same colleagues, after observing the operations of the Agricultural Adjustment Administration for the past 2 years, are now enthusiastic supporters of the act.

If anyone doubts the beneficial results of this new lease on farm life, let him examine the record from the standpoint of increased farm income and from the attitude of the farmers. Wheat has advanced in price from 35 to 90 cents, cotton from 5 to 12 cents, corn from 10 to 80 cents, hogs from 2 to 10 cents, flue-cured tobacco from 11.6 to 27.3 cents, burley tobacco from 12.5 to 16.9 cents, and rice from 39.1 to 77.5 cents. Specialty crops have in the main had splendid increases in prices. The Nation's cash farm income rose from $4,328,000,000 in 1932 to $6,090,000,000 in 1934.

The attitude of the farmers is clearly demonstrated by votes cast in recent referenda to ascertain whether the producers favored continuance of adjustment programs. The votes were as follows: Cotton, 1,361,347 for, 160,540 against. Kerr-Smith Tobacco Act, 370,907 for, 23,633 against. Flue-cured tobacco program, 184,755 for, 3,408 against. Corn hogs, 389,139 for, 190,577 against. Wheat, 404,270 for, 62,291 against. Grand total, 2,430,418 for, 440,379 against.

The chief opposition to the A. A. A. has grown out of the processing tax. The division on that subject is similar to the controversy that has raged for more than 100 years over the protective tariff tax. The farmers have paid the tariff tax on industrial commodities while basic farm commodities have been sold at world prices. The processing tax is a countervailing compensatory tax for the protection of the farmers. It now appears clear that any party which favors taking the benefits of the processing tax away from the farmers will not hereafter have their support, regardless of former political affiliations.

The recent self-styled "grass-roots convention" evidently granted that fact. The name adopted was an apt one. From newspaper accounts about the volunteer delegates composing the convention, it appears to have been an assembly of politicians who are not acquainted with the practice of destroying grass roots. If left to their efforts, grass roots would be the principal crop on all farms.

It is certain that the delegates were politicians, and good ones. After much preliminary ballyhooing against everything the administration has done the convention, guided by the advice of older heads, in effect endorsed the Agricultural Adjustment Administration.

With the farmers overwhelmingly favoring its continuance, with the Democratic Party favoring it, and the first big assembly of Republican politicians acquiescing, it appears certain that the A. A. A. is here to stay.

The present law is not perfect. Congress, in framing the act, was traveling a new road. In farming parlance, new ground was being plowed. Difficulties and obstructions have been encountered in putting administratively practical programs, national and regional, in operation. That was to be expected. No one could anticipate perfection in such a comprehensive and far-flung effort.

With all the wisdom accorded by history to the framers of our Constitution, it should be remembered that 10 amendments were shortly adopted, and 11 more have been added to meet the evolution of social and economic progress.

Congress is now considering a bill amending the original Agricultural Adjustment Act in order to strengthen weak spots that have developed in its administration and to make whatever changes are deemed necessary to avoid legalistic and technical difficulties in line with the recent decision of the Supreme Court. The original bill authorized the Secretary to put under license the handlers and processors of specialty crops such as vegetables and fruits. The present bill eliminates all authority in the Secretary to use the licensing power. It substitutes, in lieu of that plan, marketing agreements to prevent unfair trade practices, and authorizes the Secretary to issue orders to cease and desist. In the same fashion power is now exercised over industries by the Federal Trade Commission. Any handler or processor who feels that his rights have been violated by such an order is given the right to test the issue in the courts.

Marketing agreements are put in operation only upon the request of 75 percent of the producers in the region involved, and may be terminated at any time by the request of 50 percent of such producers. This program is intended to bring about orderly marketing of the crop involved. It is intended to avoid an excessive flow to a given market in a way that has so frequently resulted in prices insufficient to pay the freight or express from the farm to the market. This plan has been in operation for the last 2 years and has resulted, in numerous instances, in splendid benefits for the producers. However, the best results in many cases have not been obtained because of the resistance of handlers and distributors and frequently because of interference through a resort to the courts. It is believed by the supporters of the pending bill that many of the obstructions and difficulties that have heretofore prevailed will be eliminated.

While farmers are still greatly burdened with the debts saddled upon them by the former loss of debt-paying power, an overwhelming majority of them are looking to the future with new hope and with splendid courage. We hear nothing now about farmers mobbing judges when they render decrees foreclosing mortgages. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration has pointed the way to a better and fairer part in the national income for the producers of the food and the raw material for clothing all the people of our country.

Those who doubted the cooperation of the farmers did not truly appraise their spirit and their understanding of the effect of the age-old law of supply and demand. When given the opportunity to make that rule operate in their favor instead of against them, farmers gladly seized the opportunity and are now moving in harmony toward a better day in agricultural life.

The bill amending the Agricultural Adjustment Act, now pending before the Senate, has for its primary purpose bringing the original act clearly and definitely in line with the Supreme Court decision in the N. R. A. case. The question of delegation of power to levy a processing tax is settled by the pending bill. Congress in the exercise of its taxing power is now directly levying the tax and ratifying what its agent, the Secretary of Agriculture, has done on that subject.

A large number of processors and packers have begun suits to enjoin collection of the tax and are also demanding a refund of taxes heretofore voluntarily paid. It is a well-known fact that the taxes in nearly all instances have been deducted from producers' prices or passed on to consumers.

Representatives of some of the packers testified recently before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry that the hog tax was deducted from the price paid the farmers for the hogs. The processing tax on cotton and wheat has been generally included in the price paid by consumers. Notwithstanding this situation, a number of processors and packers, after deducting the tax at one end of their transactions or collecting it at the other end, are now attempting to enrich themselves by trying to get the taxes as a profit out of the United States Treasury. Be it said to the credit of the big packers and most of the cotton and flour mills that they have not attempted a raid of that kind.

Those who succeed in getting the taxes back, if any do, may expect the most searching examination of their books and business before any money is repaid to them, and they may also expect countless suits by producers from whom it is claimed to have been deducted, and by merchants who have paid the tax when buying the processed commodities. The pending bill, if passed, will avoid unjustified raids on the Treasury and will at the same time prevent a great multiplicity of recovery suits by producers and merchants.

No opposition to the bill from farmers has manifested itself. The principal objectors are a vociferous group of handlers of the fruits of the farmers' labor. They are concerned about the quantity handled and object to any restrictions, however necessary they may be, to avoid glutting the markets and destroying farm prices.

These minorities, whose business is based solely upon handling farm commodities, should not be permitted to wreck or weaken a program which is confessedly highly advantageous to the great mass of farmers and their families. To that group of processors, packers, and distributors, who have gone along with the program and who have gracefully submitted to the new order as presented by the A. A. A., the farmers owe a debt of gratitude.

By friendly cooperation and mutual understanding and helpfulness, all interests will in the long run be benefited.

Mr. Chester C. Davis, Administrator of the A. A. A., is doing a great job in a splendid way. In a remarkable fashion, he possesses the confidence of Members of Congress who have had contacts with him.

In my judgment, the Agricultural Adjustment Act is the outstanding piece of legislation, from the standpoint of beneficial administration, that Congress has enacted during my service in the Senate.

EDUCATION AND THE GENERAL WELFARE—ADDRESS BY SENATOR COSTIGAN

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on July 2, at Denver, Colo., the senior Senator from that State [Mr. COSTIGAN] delivered an able and interesting address to the National Education Association on Education and the General Welfare. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

As a Colorado official, with a somewhat roving commission, I ask leave to repeat our State's hospitable welcome to every present visitor. We rejoice with you over the inspired messages of this memorable convention. Your influence will be cherished when you have scattered to your homes. Our majestic mountains, living streams, and fertile plains—symbolizing freedom and achievement as fully as do the seven seas—have recorded and will often echo your eloquence and wisdom.

Our greetings, too, are not solely for this visible audience. Our hearts are also warm toward the vital, unseen spirits of your splendid predecessors in the world of education. Among them are those who, many years ago, took our young hands in theirs and, with sensitive, guiding care, made us their deathless debtors. Those teachers of other days unlocked for us life's doors of knowledge and character. Nor are these bonds all that unite us. As sons and daughters of this State's pioneers—whose faith in education was only second to their love for their children—we see in you prophetic forerunners of civilization's ultimate universe of mind, heart, and spirit. You are the chosen spokesman of unfolding destiny, and for that reason I have hurried here from a crowded and contentious National Senate to pay tribute to you as educators and to American education. Surely, in these times, as never before, you of the scholars' forum and we of legislative halls, should counsel on policies, cooperating, without the slightest trace of partisan or other self-seeking, to solve the blended and supreme problems of education and public welfare.

It is unnecessary to discuss in this presence the intimate relation between education and the general welfare. By education presumably we mean the full development, fit for practical use, of our human faculties and powers; by the general welfare the harmonizing of all those faculties and powers, aided by nature's inexhaustible resources, for the common good. If that fairly states the basic elements, then life is all and education is all but all. This great continent is well adapted to be the beneficiary of the costly experiments of old-world successes and failures, including the lessons taught by such great periods of human unrest and effort as the crusades, the Renaissance, the Reformation, and various revolutionary upheavals. As a country we still have the chance, by using educational forces, to emerge purified as gold without passing through the furnace of feverish human experiences. We are still offered a matchless opportunity to combine under government the planting of education and the peaceful harvest of general welfare in self-governing life.

A half dozen years ago a gathering like this might have been reasonably satisfied by eulogies on the traditional greatness of America. It was customary in those days to glory over this country's limitless wealth of natural resources, the sturdy and tested qualities of our diversified, adaptable, and relatively well-educated people and the idealism of America, which draws us all onward in the name of freedom and equality under law. No longer are we so easily satisfied. Today, without minimizing the force and value of that old attitude, we face the future less confident of our triumphant leadership, more informed about unhappy human facts behind our former facade of amazing but deceptive prosperity, more humble under the chastening blows of adverse years, and at times alarmed over the insecurity of America and even the future of civilization. Who longer can dispute our sound reasons for concern? Our own generation has seen a world as peaceful as that by which the sun rose and set today, rush senselessly into fratricidal war, which drew to it, as the flame the moth, nations, including our own, wholly remote from its causes. Today, in spite of pious pledges to peace—and no people have more sincerely given that pledge than America—nations which have not learned to conquer peace and fortify it for human happiness are again arming as if determined to mutliply human misery by precipitating other wars that can only make future peace unendurable and future human happiness all but impossible.

As if our daily problems were not sufficiently overwhelming, without complicating them with international violence! In our own day we have, what we began years before, though since 1929 the problem has expanded beyond all prophecy—millions of unemployed men and women in this country—among them, strangely enough, an army of educators. We have also had countless families in this land of wealth living below the level of decent subsistence and reaching the end of life propertyless; innumerable children toiling for miserable wages in place of adults who are unable to secure any employment whatever; the old a burden on the young and without reserves or socially-provided care on which to build self-respect or to cushion their forgotten loneliness. We are tried, too, as a people by tax burdens seriously increased by the World War. Yet we emerged from that conflict after doing little more than touch its boundaries of confiscated or destroyed property, incredible cruelities, and lost lives. We entered that war with reluctance; we look back on it now with regret. And we see, as never before, that our participation in future wars is certain to be sought with equal or larger provocation, and, unless education and morality can direct a sufficiently wide area of public opinion, our children and their children are doomed to far more tragic and treacherous disasters in a world of shrinking economic possibilities than our generation has visioned for America.

Let us, for the sake of balanced judgment, draw on historical perspective and compare such a modern State as ours, the richest and most favored of our time, with self-governing Greece 24 centuries ago. Greece in the golden hours of Pericles was a country relatively insignificant in size and power. Nevertheless, it was then so transcendent in intelligence and resourcefulness that its leaders expressed little concern over a possible end to its glory. Even its standards of human worth were startlingly like ours. At the close of the Peloponnesian War, Pericles voiced an exultation over the merits of the Athenian State and the secret springs of Greek genius which recalls nothing so much as the confidence in our form of government immortally phrased by Lincoln in his Gettysburg address. A chastened humility has properly made American leadership less confident in more recent years. Pericles in the ancient world, in language that fits our conception of America, praised the freedom of Athens, inherited from generations of Greek ancestors. He contrasted liberty-loving Athens with militaristic Sparta, where education glorified discipline above all other virtues, and with Corinth, stamped with the degeneracy of a land "where men care only for riches."

To Pericles, even as to Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, Wilson, and Roosevelt, deeds were more important than words; good spirits surpassed all material equipment for battle; minds nourished by free principles outran all advantages of military rigor; love of beauty without extravagance and wisdom without unmanliness were exalted; suffering was preferred to weakness and honor, and achievement outranked wealth. Above all, Pericles emphasized the uselessness to Greece of citizens who did not participate in public life, thereby superbly stressing the importance of treating private and public duties as inseparable.

It is well to revive such a picture of an earlier, worth-while civilization. Grecian contributions of that brilliant age vitally persist today. Not to look further, we do them homage in the commanding architecture of our new Supreme Court Building and the Lincoln Monument in our National Capital. Let us not forget, however, that deficiencies in Greek education undermined Greece; Greek civilization rested, not to look further, on false attitudes toward women and the forced involuntary servitude of those who do the manual work of the world. Looking back, it is perfectly apparent that Greek civilization was doomed, despite its dazzling brilliance, if only because it was built on human slavery, wholly without reference to the striking circumstance that Greek intelligence was hardly more than an island in a wide sea, or a pioneer clearing among the forests, of a largely barbarian world. Nor, though the international scene has greatly changed, can anyone doubt that, with all its world leadership, its immense resources of men and nature, its incomparably sounder economic foundations than those of Greece, America must rally all that education can contribute to natural resources, native talent, and common sense, if our civilization, like that of Greece, is eventually not to become a closed chapter in world history?

We started well. From the beginning of our national life, public leaders have been friends of education. Jefferson, the father of modern democracy, in one of his most noted declarations, the sincerity of which was attested by his years of devotion to founding the University of Virginia, insisted that no people can be ignorant and remain free. Webster considered our practice of universal education the chief glory of the Union. With the approval of these and other leaders—themselves educators in their several ways, and aided by other educators in all branches of professional and informed American life—we have had, in every generation and all regions since our Nation was formed, progressive educational development directed toward equal opportunities for all who care to draw near the light of intelligence. Thus we began, and have ever since maintained, in no little measure without Federal aid, our American school system, for the most part close to and supported by local public opinion. Accordingly, our educational system has been fed and enriched from the springs of popular understanding and conviction. Our fundamental aim has been to establish and promote the agencies and instruments of free and universal education. In so doing, we have sought to reverse Gray's Elegy by creating a land in which there shall be no "mute, inglorious Miltons", no hidden Hampdens, no concealed Cromwells, no artists denied the right to wake the world to living ecstacy. Instead, despite all handicaps, we have striven to keep in constant view trained citizens, contributing to their country their full measure of natural and instructed talents.

In education, however, as in other fields, change is the law of life. Our world moves, and, moving, is transformed. We, therefore, find ourselves today with an American educational system properly and widely rooted in popular support, yet increasingly dependent, as are other national activities, on scientific and material help from our National Government. Even in the past, Federal aid has been an important factor in the evolution of our public schools. Land grants to States for educational purposes have provided over large areas basic subsidies to support a successful and expanding educational system, and more recently, with some necessary Federal supervision over expenditures, vocational education has been widely and systematically extended by the aid of Federal contributions.

No doubt these tendencies will continue and increase, as promises to be true with respect to aid to the unemployed directly and through public works. This is the more true because many contrasted parts of our country are less prosperous than others, and our Federal system of taxation serves as an equalizer of our divergent wealth and needs. Science and invention, equally with economic forces, pass State lines without the slightest consciousness of impediments, and the Nation more and more becomes the unit of our common life. National power correspondingly grows with national expansion, even though it draws its strength from all local and individual sources. In a period of tragic economic stress, early in my Senate experience, I discovered that such admirable agencies of earlier days as the Red Cross and community chests were unprepared, without fault of their own, to meet adequately our unforeseen national emergencies. Modern life is startlingly complex. Its economic crises often spread universally and rapidly, as the last 6 years particularly illustrate. In such hours we must, without hesitation, enlist national powers and resources if we are to avoid national disaster.

Accordingly, as already suggested, we find in the modern world peace-time necessities which match in importance and magnitude the issues of war. Without depreciating the significance of local units, it is certain that our fathers obeyed a sound, fundamental instinct when they sacrificed all to save the Union as the indispensable guaranty of a reasonable and contented world for them and their descendants. Today we realize as never before how tragic the lot of vast multitudes of our people would be if they were scattered through separate States devoid of a national federation.

It should be easy, as a sequel to the welfare experiments of the last 2 years, to agree on at least a partial program of national aid to State and local educational agencies based upon such sobering facts about school conditions as the following: We have about one-fourth of the population of the country, pupils and teachers—28 million persons, not counting beyond elementary and secondary schools—in one way or another actively associated with public education; practical and vocational needs constantly expanding; an ever-pressing problem to provide an adequate teaching force to deal with individual students; 200,000 teachers at present wholly unemployed; a much larger number of teachers not receiving remuneration for a substantial portion of the regular teaching period; a host of children of school age receiving far less than full-time education; about 5 million pupils occupying unsafe or insanitary rural schools; and compensation for teachers deplorably below the level of proper subsistence, with about one-third receiving approximately $750 per year and about two-fifths less than $1,000 per year. In other words, on the material side, school buildings are today inadequate in number and frequently neither safe nor sanitary, and suitable textbooks are often unavailable; and, on the side of mental training, pupils are at a sad disadvantage educationally in many parts of America because of the restricted number of teachers, the small compensation many of them receive, and the corresponding lack of dignity and leadership suffered by a profession which is discounted because it is ill-rewarded and left without the stimulus which comes from proven public appreciation of the importance of the task teachers discharge.

Already certain constructive efforts on a Nation-wide scale to free educators from economic difficulties and widen the opportunities for pupils are urgently and federally required. Not only pupils, but teachers also, should be given the largest possible opportunities for liberal training as part of the gratifying development of a science of education. The priceless possibilities of children must be concretely affirmed in enlarged privileges during years of sensitive and responsive growth, alike in school equipment and inspiration from those who guide awakening minds. Our Nation should lend the stimulus of appropriations to States and localities under conditions which will reasonably promote the great ends in view. America should hold itself ready to do regularly for education what heretofore it has done spasmodically. It should be prepared to sacrifice, if need be, lesser values for the illimitable possibilities of a future of wholly free and thoroughly sound popular education.

In support of these necessary steps I bring you assurances that many progressive leaders in public life stand ready to assist and will prove helpfully responsive to any well-conceived, human program of Federal aid to education which your united authority is prepared to recommend.

Certainly we ought to be able, without further argument, to agree on such minimum Federal steps as these:

First. Grants-in-aid by the Federal Government to States, where necessary, for free public education designed to liberalize and equalize opportunities for teachers and students, without undermining traditions of wholesome local school control and direction. As suggested, this does not mean the sacrifice, but rather the strengthening, of values which have long marked our school system. Undoubtedly today reasonable Federal contributions are needed to keep sound local forces alive and effectively functioning. The precedents already set by federally donated lands for State schools and Federal grants in aid of vocational education—not to mention the Nation's experiment with public works, State relief grants, and our public-roads policy—demonstrate the adaptability, with safeguards for uniform standards and decentralized management, of a Federal-State program.

Second. Nation-wide insistence on minimum school facilities and attendance for a period of from 8 to 9 months of every school year.

Third. Teachers in all schools adequately trained and fairly compensated for their professional responsibilities.

Fourth. Safe, healthful, and modern schools in all parts of the United States, with proper school and mechanical equipment, including suitable textbooks available to all pupils.

In undertaking these and other experiments in education, as in government, we must have, of course, a sane and natural merger of State and Federal activities, with broad opportunities for effective local agencies, side by side with the beneficial stimulus flowing from our national living principles and destiny. If America is fairly to follow the path of its logical development, we must continue the values of our interwoven local and national educational system. The significance of the task justifies us in demanding from those who benefit by such an educational program both personal development and dedication to community welfare. We are all partners in building and perpetuating our country and contemporary civilization. The modern world, through education and aroused morality, if it is to pay its debt to the past, must steadily eliminate such fatal flaws as weakened and wrecked earlier governmental experiments. This can be done as always by substituting good for bad and better for worse, by widely distributing educational resources and opportunities for national human life, and by modern invention and scientific achievements which override the demands of human selfishness by insistence on universal brotherhood.

We are aided in all such efforts by those subtle forces of the universe that keep alive, despite all odds, beauty, virtue, and truth. We have, too, the support of nature's latent and reborn life and powers. Recognizing the imperfections of any individual contribution, we refuse to accept any education which claims to be "finished." We demand, instead, a better and more progressive humanity, inspired by our world's evolutionary plan. We adopt Professor Breasted's conclusion that man throughout history has followed, and must continue to follow, "a rising trail."

What I have been trying in part to express or imply is the wisdom of the old Athenian message that all citizens, teachers, and students alike should have, or acquire, and faithfully perpetuate a living interest and participation in public affairs. Perhaps it is natural, in view of my own activities, that I should conclude that no other test of truly educated men or women is so final or unerring as that of active and effective citizenship. Our Nation's ideals of a perfect Union, established justice, insured domestic tranquillity, provision for the common defense, and assured general welfare must stand or fall with education. There is no substitute. If I am to be permitted to leave with you one remembered word, it is that. Happily in so saying, I do not speak either presumptuously or as a voice crying in the wilderness. Others with higher educational authority than mine, leaders in your profession, have not failed to speak in candid criticism of the economic, social, and political failures of the modern world as the product of defective education. Indeed, educators have spoken as frankly of the shortcomings of their magnificent profession as have prophets of the practice of divine religion. They know and you know—though the fault rests in some degree on all of us who in our separate spheres contribute to the educated mind—that when civilization has failed education has failed, and by the same token when civilization has succeeded education has triumphed. It may be added, with equal confidence, that when the America our forefathers planned shall have succeeded in establishing sound political and industrial equality and self-government, and in utilizing the resources of this continent for the general welfare, American education will have come to its own. Either way, whether our banners rise or fall, the major responsibility must in the long run be borne by American educators in every walk of life.

In what has been thus far said, it has been assumed that there will be little difficulty in agreeing on a modest beginning of a national effort to underwrite the improvement and renovation of our American educational system. The purpose is to adapt that system to our rapidly changing civilization and to fit the youth of a new generation to take their proper place in the front ranks of priceless living citizenship. If it be argued that, in so doing, we are cutting across inherited traditions and experiences, the answer is that the New World makes new attitudes unavoidable. We must remember that we have, under State and Federal Constitutions, both State and National citizenship. We must, accordingly, educate every new generation to meet its new responsibilities. Educational leadership will certainly not oppose the common-sense view that Nation and States can only coexist in harmonious efficiency if we continue, through education, to promote equipment for essential services and the general welfare. If we fail to achieve those ends by reason of conflicts between limited respective jurisdictions, the General Government will surely find public opinion rallying to endow the Nation with ample authority to grapple with important problems which States, by reason of limited territorial authority, are admittedly unable to control.

Recently in Washington an important decision of the United States Supreme Court has been interpreted by some as revitalizing the authority of States to deal with problems within their borders, and as excluding the Federal Government from legislating on subjects not obviously interstate in nature and effect. That decision has temporarily involved in chaos the far-reaching Federal experiment of the National Industrial Recovery Act of 1933, which had increased employment, raised wages, largely abolished child labor, and at least substituted a form of industrial planning for previous industrial planlessness. The decision has also clouded with confusion the assumed authority of the Federal Government to legislate effectively on Nation-wide industrial problems. Uncertainty is added by the fact that not many years ago the United States Supreme Court likewise denied to States the right, among other activities, to fix minimum wages, even for women workers who are especially handicapped in bargaining with employers, or otherwise secure wages for work assuring a decent level of subsistence. It has similarly become apparent that some States, seeking industrial advantages over others, by the employment of children and other cheap labor, have brought us face to face with competitive national problems which can be solved, if at all, only by uniform national legislation.

It follows that if the Supreme Court adheres to such precedents we must, soon or late, decide whether this Nation can afford to ignore resulting human tragedies, or by constitutional amendment is to secure enlarged power enabling it to legislate for proper and indispensable national objectives. Indeed, a constitutional crisis may be approaching in America similar to those stirring historical controversies, which in the past have taken the Nation into new legislative paths and have given it new constitutional guaranties of human rights and liberties. We have long rejoiced over the immortal 10 first amendments to the Federal Constitution. They are our personal Bill of Rights. With their inspired safeguards before us, if the denial of flexibility to the Federal Constitution continues, we may soon be called upon to write other amendments to our Constitution, defining the standards of an economic bill of rights.

To many it will be startling to discover that we are being driven into the crosscurrents and delays of amendments to the Federal Constitution. It has long been the boast of liberal leaders of the American bench and bar that, under the present powers of the Constitution, authority may be found enabling our Nation boldly and with originality to experiment for the general welfare. On that reasonable and happy constitutional theory Congress enacted much humane legislation between 1933 and the present hour. However, the recent unanimous decision of the Supreme Court indicates a regrettably inflexible change of judicial mood. Indeed, many qualified constitutional lawyers view that decision as nothing less than one of those legislative declarations of our highest judicial tribunal, which in the past have proven vital turning points in history.

The justification of nationally uniform and often humane legislation, which, from time to time, has thus been halted by unexpected judicial construction, is to be found in the essential purposes—including the general-welfare clause—of our Federal Constitution. In an address in November 1787 before the Pennsylvania Convention, which was elected to consider the adoption of our American Federal Constitution, James Wilson, one of the ablest of the Constitution's framers, gave the following as his view of the merger under the Constitution of State and National authority:

"Whatever object of government is confined, in its operation and effects, within the bounds of a particular State, should be considered as belonging to the government of the State; whatever object of government extends, in its operation or effects, beyond the bounds of a particular State, should be considered as belonging to the Government of the United States."

We have even higher authority. Our hero-worshipers are making us forget that George Washington was a great forward-looking liberal, who smashed precedents at will. Virginia was the first State to act on the proposal to call the Convention at Philadelphia, which wrote our Federal Constitution. The Journal of James Madison discloses that George Washington headed the Virginia delegation which took a leading part in the work of that Convention. That delegation was specially instructed by the General Assembly of Virginia "to join—in devising and discussing all such alterations and farther provisions as may be necessary to render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of the Union. * * *" The Virginia delegation, undoubtedly with the approval of George Washington, subsequently submitted proposals for the consideration of the Philadelphia Convention, including the declaration that "the National Legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the confederation and moreover to legislate in all cases in which the separate States are incompetent or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted by the exercise of individual legislation. * * *" Thus we discover the incomparable name and approval of George Washington behind a liberal interpretation of the intent of the enumerated powers granted Congress by the Constitution. Here is but part of the persuasive evidence in the proceedings of the Constitutional Convention of Washington's far-sighted view that Congress was designed to be free, within expressed and implied constitutional grants, to legislate in behalf of general well-being in the United States in all cases where the States, acting separately, are unable to cope with national problems.

These expressions of our forefathers are but other ways of declaring that this Nation should be equipped to deal, in peace as in war, with all pervasive problems of the general welfare which cannot be solved by State action. It was the failure to act on that assumption which resulted in the sword of Civil War carving into the body of our Federal Constitution its thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments.

Is it not evident that the best assurances of the survival of our self-governing institutions lies in minds which place rights and duties beyond the temptation of profit; and which insist at all cost on free discussion, religious liberty, a free press, the right of free assemblage, fair trials, and other priceless guarantees of our Bill of Rights, as well as the industrial democracy which is the inevitable, modern sequence of those earlier assertations of individual liberty and equality? We must never forget that the framers of the Constitution provided the authority to adopt constitutional amendments. In this connection, let us recall that the Federal Constitution went into effect on March 4, 1789, and that on September 25, 1789—little more than 6 months later—Members of the First Congress, under the Constitution and the Presidency of George Washington, showed their readiness to use the amendatory method by submitting to the States 12 amendments, 10 of which were subsequently ratified by the original States, have ever since been retained, and are today known to the world as "the American Bill of Rights."

The founders of the American Union were well aware that free government, like free education, must be subject to change; that the ultimate governmental issue in the world is between flexible popular rule and ever-encroaching inflexible dictatorships; and that only under popular sovereignty, with the aid of expanding education, can life be permanently desirable and liberated from the threats of ever-increasing tyranny, under which the alternatives for human beings are submission to arbitrary rule, revolt, or suicidal wars. Equally important to bear in mind is the truth that, under free government, education forever leads those who teach and those who learn toward illimitable horizons of science, literature, free utterance and criticism, and triumphant fraternity. Soon or late it will be apparent that our world's progressive evolution discards the evils of one age to make way for the glories of another.

Fortunately, we are an adaptable and practical people, and there can be little doubt that, in the long run, we shall continue to advance with reasoned judgment along the highways of necessary national authority, in the exercise of which our final security must be guaranteed by government of, by, and for the people. Certainly, in that forward drive, we can do no harm by adopting, through constitutional amendments Federal authority, favored by George Washington, adequate to meet national problems and serve the whole Nation's well-being. Thus, from the largest to the least governmental units, the Federal-State plan of the founders of our system of government will rule the length and breadth of the land, giving assurances of a mighty destiny in which education will accept as its highest duty the support of the general welfare.

REGULATION OF HOLDING COMPANIES

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two brief editorial observations of the Philadelphia Record of July 11, 1935, the first dealing with the pending utilities bill, and the second discussing the attitude of the reactionary newspapers toward the President of the United States.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record of July 11, 1935]

AS THOUSANDS DO NOT CHEER

The holding companies are still celebrating their great victory for the little investor in the House defeat of the Wheeler-Rayburn bill "death clause."

Unfortunate that a sour note should zoom over the horizon to annoy the celebrants.

In New York Federal District Court Monday, 23,000 little investors in Insulll holding-company securities were denied the right to recover $30,000,000, represented by securities which Insull pledged with a group of New York banks.

These little investors believed what they read on their debenture certificates—or what they thought they read:

"In Insull Utility Investment Corporation 'covenants' not to pledge 'any of its assets without securing the debenture holders equally, except for short-term loans in the usual course of business.'"

But the court ruled that when Insull put up $30,000,000 worth of the good securities of his operating companies—the real assets behind these debentures—he was merely obtaining a loan "in the usual course of business."

In other words, the "covenant" was worthless. It didn't mean a thing, even back in 1929.

How tragic that the power lobby wasn't on hand then to protect the right of the little investors.

DAMNED IF HE DOES, DAMNED IF HE DOESN'T

On one thing the reactionary newspapers of the United States are agreed:

That whatever Mr. Roosevelt does—it's wrong.

Two years ago the Record warned the President that no matter what he did, no matter how conciliatory he might wish to be, he couldn't please the Tories, because the Tories would simply refuse to be pleased.

Last week the New York Herald Tribune, commenting on the Wheeler-Rayburn bill, denounced Mr. Roosevelt as a President "who has so lost his sense of perspective as to try to assume dictatorial powers over Congress."

This week the New York Herald Tribune, commenting on the Roosevelt tax program, denounces the President for "passing the buck" to the House Ways and Means Committee as to how much the new taxes should raise. And it adds: "Beyond the very general recommendations contained in the President's message, the administration refuses to be of assistance. * * *"

Damned as a dictator yesterday.

Damned for lack of leadership today.

Commenting on the holding-company bill, the Philadelphia Inquirer upheld the House for "defending the rights of the people from destruction by Presidential command."

Now, speaking of the tax bill, the Inquirer declares that "Secretary Morgenthau refuses to be headed in any definite direction, and he leaves the situation as much in the fog as ever."

Had the President demanded that Congress raise a specific sum, say, $500,000,000—

The Tories now would be denouncing him for interfering with the legislative prerogatives of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Roosevelt is damned if he does, damned if he doesn't.

The Tories stick to their theme song:

"No matter what it is, we're against it."

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the first committee amendment passed over.

The first committee amendment passed over was, in section 5, paragraph (2), page 11, line 4, after the word "apples", to strike out "and not including fruits for canning."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I hope this amendment will not be acted upon quite so speedily. The people in my section of the country are anxious to have the House language restored, and I think there is abundant reason why it should be restored. I do not happen to be prepared today to discuss it at great length, but there are those here who desire to do so. I know that my seat mate, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], is very much interested in this amendment, and is anxious to have the House language restored. I notice that the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is on his feet.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me time to make an explanation?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. I suppose there was no subject in the bill that was more thoroughly discussed than was this one. Fruits are more or less perennials. Orchards are of yearly production without replanting and without the ordinary methods necessary in cultivating an annual crop. It was evident to the committee that the canning of fruits was as much a part of their marketing as was selling them in the fresh state. The fact is it was brought to the attention of the committee that perhaps at times the major portion of the fruits which are produced, such as peaches, apricots, apples, and other fruits, are used in canning. Therefore, if the object of this bill is to create such a condition as will give the producer the opportunity to have a price which will enable him to receive a return somewhat approximating the profits which are made by the processors, his market should be taken care of, and we cannot leave one half the product unregulated and the other half regulated. We must either do away with any attempt to have the fruit market regulated or we have got to put both fruits used for canning and fresh fruits in the same category.

I think before the consideration of this paragraph shall have been concluded I will offer an amendment putting vegetables in the same category in which the Senate committee put fruits.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I do.

Mr. LOGAN. I note what the Senator says, but, so far as tobacco is concerned, with the processing tax imposed on the firm or corporation or individual manufacturing tobacco and yet the individual farmer allowed to sell his natural-leaf tobacco to the consumer without the processing tax at all, it interferes very seriously with those who manufacture twist tobacco and other natural-leaf products. Has the Senator given or did the committee give any consideration to that question?

Mr. SMITH. I think that is the first time my attention has been called to any situation where the farmer was manufacturing his own tobacco.

Mr. LOGAN. The farmer is allowed to sell his leaf tobacco to the consumers. The farmers are organized and doing that throughout the tobacco district. They sell the tobacco to those who want to use the natural leaf. The manufactured twist tobacco has to pay a processing tax. The farmer who can sell his own tobacco to the consumer does it without a processing tax.

Mr. SMITH. Does the Senator mean the one who uses it for chewing or smoking gets it direct from the farmer and uses it in the unmanufactured and raw state?

Mr. LOGAN. Absolutely that is what I mean to say, and that is done very extensively.

Mr. SMITH. I never heard of it before.

Mr. LOGAN. It is done very extensively, and the manufacturers of twist and other natural-leaf products are making very serious complaint.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may state that my seat mate, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], who is necessarily absent at the moment, is very much interested in this item. It has been suggested to me by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and others who are interested, that perhaps the Senator from South Carolina would allow this item to go over for an hour or two.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I hope the Senators now engaged in conversation will speak loudly enough for us over here to understand what is taking place.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator from New York has made request that this amendment, which I had hoped might be disposed of, may go over for an hour or two. If there is no objection, I am agreeable that it shall be passed over temporarily.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from South Carolina to ask unanimous consent that the amendment which has just been stated may go over for 1 hour. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, while we are in this subject, I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina, the chairman of the committee, for information with reference to fruits which are perishable, such as peaches, plums, apricots, and all kinds of berries. Upon what theory can or should they be made subject to the terms of the bill? I cannot fathom the regulations which would be put into effect and the orders which would be submitted which would deal with such perishable products.

Mr. SMITH. It was the impression of the committee that of all producers in America who really ought to have aid, those whose products are perishable should be given consideration. The Senator must be familiar with the fact that watermelons, with which product I am somewhat familiar, have been shipped from time to time in carload lots to the great metropolitan centers. After a lapse of time, in many cases, the producer would get a freight bill back with the statement that the watermelons did not sell for sufficient to pay the freight. In other words, he gave someone a carload of watermelons and paid a bonus to have them take the melons.

I know that in my own community a certain individual some years ago started to raise artichokes for pickling purposes. Being a thrifty individual, he went to New York and engaged them at $5 a barrel. He shipped about 3 barrels preliminarily. The freight was $4.90, so that he got 10 cents out of the fruit. When I recounted that incident here years ago the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] said the railroad companies had made a mistake and had overlooked the 10 cents.

The perishable nature of fruits and vegetables is such as to lend those products very readily to exploitation by the handlers and those who market them. Of all the people who need some kind of organization so that they can secure fair treatment and get a return for that which they produce for the benefit of the consumer, the producers of fruits and vegetables are the ones who need this kind of legislation, properly framed, without doing violence to the handler, and yet seeing to it that the producer gets an equitable return for what he produces and sells.

That is my answer to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may not be able to be present in the Chamber when the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] is here and the amendment with reference to fruits and canning of fruits is again before the Senate for discussion. Therefore I wish to say at this time briefly that in Florida there is no antagonism between the grower and the canner. So far as I can learn, one helps the other.

In the matter of grapefruit, for instance, I have eaten grapefruit ripened on the tree, perfectly wholesome and delicious because ripened in that way. It would not be possible to ship grapefruit of that kind at all. It has to be used at once. It cannot reach the market at all.

Then there is grapefruit which, because of some discoloration or defect on the outside, is not marketable. That kind of grapefruit the canner can and does use. Without the canner the grower would get nothing for it. It would be a total loss to him. That being true, the fruit which is not marketable, which cannot be carried any distance, depends upon the canner for a market. The canner comes and selects his fruit and pays for it, and that is the end of it so far as the producer is concerned. There are no packing charges, there are no hauling charges, and there are no freight charges. The grower gets just that much out of the crop which he would not otherwise get. Consequently he is interested in maintaining and encouraging the canner. There is no conflict between them, but there is a mutual desire to help each other.

The canner can get fruit which does not go to market and would not be marketed at all, which is perfectly good fruit and delicious in every way, wholesome and healthy and eminently suited for canning purposes. The grower gets a return for fruit which would otherwise be lost to him and wasted.

Consequently there is no antagonism between the grower and the canner. They are, I repeat, mutually helpful. The canners do not want to be included under the bill, and that is universally the position they take in Florida, so far as I am advised. They want the provision retained as it came from the House, and therefore object to the committee amendment which would eliminate fruit for canning purposes. We believe in the House provision, and when the time comes we shall vote against the amendment of the committee in that respect.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I listened with a great deal of interest to the statement made by the chairman of the committee in answer to my interrogation as to the propriety and wisdom of including fruit under the provisions of the bill. I return very briefly to the subject.

The Senator from South Carolina knows that farmers and owners of small orchards produce fruit for their own use. There are millions of orchards in the United States in which are grown limited quantities of peaches, apples, plums, and apricots, as well as all kinds of berries. It seems to me it is absolutely impossible to set up a workable plan, even if we desired to do so, which would subject all persons who grow fruits for their own use, or for shipment, to the regimentation which is provided or will be provided under the terms of the bill if it should be enacted into law.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. There is no provision whatever relating to fruits growing for personal use. This is wholly with respect to that fruit which is grown for marketing purposes, and that in interstate transactions only. There is nothing in the bill which pertains to the regimentation or the regulation of fruits grown for personal use.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have read the bill rather carefully and I have not found the line of delimitation which is indicated by the able Senator from South Carolina. If it could be made very clear that the bill is to include only fruits that may be grown for shipment in interstate commerce, it would remove some of the objections which I am now attempting to urge against the provisions of the bill with respect to this particular matter. When we again take up this subject, upon the return of the Senator from Georgia to the Chamber, I may renew my observations or inquiries concerning it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment passed over.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 6, after the words "(not including vegetables for canning)", it is proposed to insert "soybeans, hops, package bees and queen bees, poultry."

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 11, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the word "hops."

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, I also have presented an amendment which would strike out, on page 16, the words "hops and their products"; and because they should be considered together I ask unanimous consent that the two amendments may be considered together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I do not understand the request of the Senator from Wisconsin. I gather that he desires to strike out the word "hops" on page 11 in line 6. He then referred to the word "products." That is found on line 1, page 11. Therefore, what is the full nature of the Senator's proposal?

Mr. DUFFY. The proposal is to strike out the word "hops", on page 11, line 6, as the Senator has stated. However, to carry out the purpose of eliminating the word "hops" at that place it would also be necessary to strike out the words "hops and their products" on page 16, lines 11 and 12; and the two proposals should be considered together.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DUFFY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. The insertion of the word "hops" is a committee amendment; so the question would arise on rejecting or approving the committee amendment, would it not?

Mr. DUFFY. I present my amendment as an amendment to the committee amendment, proposing to strike out the word "hops." I am not raising any question as to the remainder of the committee amendment including "soybeans, package bees and queen bees, poultry." I merely wish to strike out the word "hops."

At the present time there are approximately 1,300 hop growers in the whole United States. Largely, they are located in the State of Oregon, and some also in the States of Washington and California. After the manufacture of beer was legalized in 1933, hops commanded an unusual and an unwarranted high price. Perhaps it was warranted by the scarcity at the time; but many persons, especially in the three States I have named, rushed into the hop-growing business, I suppose upon the theory that the excessively high prices for hops would continue; and I assume that the purpose of putting hops in this bill is to give them, possibly, some relief.

The same amendment that the committee has recommended was proposed in the House of Representatives. The amendment was defeated. I do not refer to my amendment; but in the House it was proposed to insert the word "hops" in the bill. That proposal was defeated in the House by a vote of approximately, as I recall, two and a half to one. I do not recall that it was a record vote. I believe it was a standing vote; but I think the action of the House was correct, and that hops should not be included in the bill.

Hops and the products of hops would be subject to the orders of the Secretary of Agriculture if the word "hops" should be permitted to remain in the bill. Such orders dealing with the handling of hops and their products may limit the total quantity of hops of any grade, size, or quality that may be marketed or transported to market by handlers during any specified period. They may also allot the amount of such commodity which each handler may purchase from producers. Such allotment is required to be made in accordance with some uniform rule based upon the amount of the commodities produced or sold by producers during a representative period, and such period would be determined by the Secretary of Agriculture.

Allotments to individual handlers are required to be made in accordance with a uniform rule. They may provide in such orders as to the extent of any surplus or of any grade, size, or quality; and the justification, apparently, from the report of the committee, is:

> There is a market supply in excess of quantities sufficient to meet an effective consumption demand.

Mr. President, in my opinion, the system which has been proposed in this bill does not lend itself at all readily to the conditions under which hops are marketed. Hops are used almost exclusively in brewing beer and similar fermented malt liquors. It is the hops which give the beer its flavor; and although there are several tests recognized for hops, strange as it may seem, the most important test is the test for aroma.

If seeds and stems are not eliminated in picking hops, each pound of hops is much less valuable for brewing purposes. I am reliably informed—and I have been consulting with the departments here which seem to have information on the subject—that there has been only a very small carry-over as to the better grade of hops; that is, the grade of hops suitable for brewing purposes.

Many people who rushed into raising the crop of hops in the past year or two were not prepared for it. They did not have suitable kilns for drying the hops. The stems and the seeds were picked and were not carefully separated, and the result has been that a good many of the hops produced in this country have not been very suitable for brewing purposes; and as the aroma is an important element in the grading and quality of hops, it seems to me it is quite apparent that hops cannot be so susceptible of standardization as to justify their being placed in this bill.

To allot by any uniform rule, as required by the bill, would be, in my opinion, to penalize the growers of the better grade of hops, and to penalize the brewers of the country. I say that because, for instance, if production should be restricted by 25 percent, it would mean that there would be available next year 25 percent less of a good grade and the lower grades which are not so suitable and not so readily adapted to brewing purposes, and a brewer would have two alternatives. He would either have to make up the 25-percent reduction from a lower grade than he would otherwise like to do, or else he would have to use imported hops.

I am informed that the hop growers are not all in accord with the sentiment of my friend from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. Oregon has the largest crop of hops. I am informed, for instance, that the growers of 70 percent of the hops, in Sonoma County, Calif., where the better grade of hops is grown, have telegraphed various Senators and members of the committee that they do not desire to have hops included under the bill. I do not think, generally speaking, that the growers of the better grade of hops do desire to be under the bill.

For instance, the New York State Agricultural Department is now doing some experimental work to rehabilitate the hop-growing industry in that State. I doubt very much if it would be possible for them to do so if the Secretary of Agriculture should undertake to limit the distribution and exercise the power and authority which he would have under this bill.

Senators will note that the bill says "hops and their products." On page 10 it says:

> Orders issued pursuant to this section shall be applicable only to the following agricultural commodities and the products thereof.

What are the products of hops? Where would the line be drawn? Is not the language broad enough in its terms to include beer as a product of hops? If so, then it seems to me certainly there should be no such provision as this in the bill, because if it is a reasonable interpretation of what are the products of hops that beer might be so construed, the bill would give the Secretary power, by an order, to regulate the marketing of beer, including the fixing of trade practices, prices, and many other things which obviously should not be attempted in a bill of this kind.

Because of the practical impossibility of the standardization of hops, and because it seems to me it has not any place in this bill, I have urged this amendment, which will be in accord with the action taken by the House of Representatives.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think it would be well for me to explain to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] and to other Members of the Senate the situation from a parliamentary standpoint as it affects hops.

The Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry a month ago reported favorably a bill to amend the original Agricultural Adjustment Act so as to include hops as a basic commodity. I offered an amendment to that measure to place a processing tax of 2 cents a pound on hops. The bill is on the calendar, and no action has been taken on it.

The brewers of the country and some of the hop dealers, not interested in the production of hops, objected to any legislation affecting hops, upon the false theory that it was an attempt to penalize them by making them pay a higher price. For that reason, I have not asked to have taken from the calendar and considered the bill making hops a basic commodity, which carries with it a processing tax.

Consequently, when the committee met to consider the amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, I offered an amendment to include hops, and the committee included it, but it affects hops only so far as marketing agreements are concerned.

Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Wisconsin has said; there is no desire whatsoever on the part of the producers of hops along the Pacific coast to have beer included under a marketing agreement, or in any way to have it brought within the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture, so far as the particular legislation now before us is concerned. Therefore I suggest at this time as an amendment—and I think I have such an amendment in my files—that after the word "hops", on page 11, line 6, there shall be included the following language: "Not including the products thereof." At this time I ask that the committee amendment be modified in that respect.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and the committee amendment is modified as suggested by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, that takes entirely out of consideration the interest of the brewer.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Of course, there are in my State a great many brewers, and I have consulted with them in regard to this suggestion, and they have told me that the statement just made by the Senator is not in accord with their ideas. In other words, they feel that hops should not be in the bill at all, that it is much better to have it as the Senator now proposes in his suggestion, but it still seems to me so fundamental that I do not think hops ought to be included in the bill.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am not attempting to dispute the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin. I have received telegrams from brewers to the effect that they would be perfectly satisfied with hops included in a marketing agreement. It is only as it affects their product, beer, or brings them under the processing tax, which this amendment would not do, that they object.

I think I can also well disregard any opposition of the few brewers who may not be favorable to this proposal—and I think some of them may reside and conduct their business activities in the State of Wisconsin—because nearly all the brewers, so far as I know, have either assured the hop men or the dealers that they had no objection to the plan which I am now proposing.

Mr. President, the production of hops is one of the substantial industries in three Pacific Coast States—Oregon, Washington, and California. The growers of hops in those States do not in any way desire to impose any new obligations or burdens on the brewery business. In those three States millions of dollars are invested in the production of hops as an agricultural occupation. It is a crop, produced from the soil, that requires more labor than the production of any other agricultural crop. Men, and women and children particularly, are engaged in the production of hops, and in their cultivation and harvesting. It is a crop whose production affects the poorer homes more particularly, thereby resulting in greater social relief than the production of any other crop harvested along the Pacific coast.

Recently a plebiscite was held, and all the hop growers of the country took a vote on whether they wanted to come within the provisions of the pending bill, and the Secretary of Agriculture, through his agents, notified me a few days ago that the vote was 7 to 1—seven producers of hops favored the inclusion of that commodity in the pending bill against one who did not.

What effect would the adoption of the proposal have on the breweries? It would be so infinitesimal that I am surprised that any one brewer, however many brewers there may be in the United States, should object to the provision. On my desk here is a statement from the Department of Agriculture, with which I am conversant, that less than 1 pound of hops goes into a barrel of beer which contains 32 gallons—less than 1 pound of hops is required to season a barrel of beer which contains 32 gallons.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. Does the Senator know anything concerning the suggestion I made that there are growers of better grades of hops on the Pacific coast who do not desire to come under the bill?

Mr. McNARY. I know of only one such grower, and he is Mr. E. Clem Horst, who has a farm not far from where my farm is located in the beautiful Willamette Valley in western Oregon.

Mr. President, what does the Department of Agriculture say with regard to parity? If there is any virtue in the bill before us, if there is any desire upon the part of the Members of Congress to help the grower, the desire is to put him on a parity with other products and with industry. The Department of Agriculture says that by reason of the price which hops bring their parity is 38 percent, on the basis of 100 as an index number. The market price is 100 percent under the cost of production.

The hop growers cannot live under those conditions. If we are to include in the bill soybeans, package bees, queen bees, fruits, and vegetables, upon the theory that marketing agreements affecting them may bring about better conditions in the particular industries, the appeal for the growers of hops is stronger than is the appeal as to any other agricultural commodity within the bill.

If one would just look at this proposal soberly, and in the interest of the grower and not the brewer, he could see its advantages.

Mr. DUFFY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. DUFFY. I assume the reference to "sober consideration" has nothing to do with the product of hops? [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. No, indeed; I qualified that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I understand the Senator's amendment would eliminate the products of hops.

Mr. McNARY. Exactly. I am standing here as a representative of the growers of hops. The amendment would have no effect on the brewers of the country, who can look after their own interests.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator will permit me, I believe the Senator from Wisconsin said that the chief and most valuable product of hops was the aroma of beer. If this tax should be imposed upon hops, does the Senator think it would have a deleterious effect on the aroma of beer? [Laughter.]

Mr. McNARY. Not at all. I have some interest from the grower's standpoint, and it is not the burr which makes the aroma of the beer. It is the lupulin, a pink substance which lies close to the core or seed. That is what produces the aromatic quality in beer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair call attention to the parliamentary situation, which the Senator may desire to consider. As the Chair understands, there are two amendments to be considered as one on page 11. On request of the Senator from Oregon, and by unanimous consent, an amendment to the committee amendment, including the words "not including the products thereof" after the word "hops" in line 6, has been adopted; but the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin also deals with the word "hops" on line 11, page 16. The two are to be voted on together, as the Chair understands.

Mr. McNARY. Yes. I stated very frankly, with some knowledge of the subject matter, that it was far from my idea, that it was wholly outside of my purpose, to involve the brewers and their products in the bill at all, and wherever the word "products" appears in the bill I wish to have it removed. I appeal to Members of the Senate from the standpoint of the grower of the raw material. I am only asking that hops be included in this particular section as it affects marketing agreements. I do not know whether it is tremendously important or not, but the hop growers think so.

In the original act the subject was treated from the standpoint of a license. In the pending bill there is an effort to treat it from the standpoint of an order. At this particular time the Department of Agriculture has worked out a hop agreement which, I think, has been adopted by the hop growers of the country and the salesmen of hops and the handlers thereof in a very satisfactory way. The proposed amendment merely clarifies the original act, and agreements based thereon. In other words, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the consent of the hop producers, and upon their petition, without the opposition of the brewers of the country, has worked out an agreement under this section as contained in the organic act, and all I am doing, I repeat, is to ask for the insertion of hops as an agricultural commodity, for the purpose of clarifying the language, making certain what the agreement is, and eliminating the brewer and his interests, and the products of hops.

Mr. President, when we stop to consider what we are trying to do by this bill, and realize that the hop industry is a very large one in these States; that the cost of production is 100 percent under the sale price, and that the proposal now made will not take any of the profits away from the brewer or affect him injuriously in any way, I think we shall come to the conclusion that this commodity ought to stay in this provision in order that there may be certainty with respect to the law and the agreements based thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] give his attention to page 16, line 11, where the word "hops" occurs, following which there occur the words "and their products."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the words "and their products", following the word "hops", on page 16, line 11, be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the words "and their products", following the word "hops" in lines 11 and 12, on page 16, of the bill are stricken out.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, let me call attention to a necessary amendment in line 1, page 11, which follows in line with the argument of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. The sentence begins at the bottom of page 10, line 23, as follows:

> Orders issued pursuant to this section shall be applicable only to the following agricultural commodities and the products thereof (except products of naval stores).

I suggest that to carry out the request made by the Senator from Oregon he should include hops at that point so it would read "(except products of hops and of naval stores)."

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I have no desire to quarrel with the chairman of the committee or make any suggestion other than the one I originally made, which was that after the word "hops" in line 6, page 11, there be inserted the words "not including the products thereof."

Mr. SMITH. I thought perhaps it would simplify the matter if the language were inserted in line 1, page 11, because they both come within the same category.

Mr. McNARY. I am perfectly willing to do so. I want to keep out of this bill any reference at all to the brewery interests, and I wish to have the provision placed at the point where it is most suitable.

Mr. SMITH. We had excepted naval stores, and I thought it would be well to place the exception as to hops in the same place.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, are we sure now that the brewers have been left out?

Mr. McNARY. I had hoped so. I think they are perfectly able to take care of themselves. I made the statement I did in order to declare the purposes of the amendment, and simply to make it certain that I am only dealing with the growers of hops and not with the brewers.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to be sure.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] to the committee amendment as amended, to strike out the word "hops" on page 11, line 6, and also to strike out the word "hops" on line 11, page 16.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Clark	La Follette	Radcliffe
Ashurst	Connally	Lewis	Reynolds
Austin	Coolidge	Logan	Robinson
Bachman	Davis	Lonergan	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	McAdoo	Schall
Bankhead	Donahey	McGill	Schwellenbach
Barkley	Duffy	McKellar	Sheppard
Bilbo	Fletcher	McNary	Shipstead
Black	Frazier	Maloney	Smith
Bone	George	Metcalf	Steiwer
Borah	Gerry	Minton	Townsend
Brown	Gibson	Moore	Trammell
Bulkley	Glass	Murray	Truman

Byrd	Hale	Norris	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Hastings	Nye	Wagner
Capper	Hatch	O'Mahoney	Walsh
Caraway	Johnson	Overton	Wheeler
Carey	Keyes	Pittman	White
Chavez	King	Pope

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the question was put to a vote very hurriedly. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was adopted be reconsidered in order that I may ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] to the committee amendment was agreed to be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. DUFFY. I understand the request is made by the Senator from Oregon in order that there may be a yea-and-nay vote on the question?

Mr. McNARY. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the vote by which the amendment to the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. McNARY. On the question of the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the committee amendment, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEIWER. I think I understand the situation, but I wish to state my understanding of it. The question now recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] to perfect the committee amendment by striking out the words "hops, not including the products thereof", in line 6, page 11, and on page 16, line 11, striking out the word "hops." Those who favor the committee amendment would, therefore, vote "nay", and those who are in favor of striking out the word "hops" and the words "not including the products thereof" would vote "yea"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the parliamentary situation.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, those desiring to vote for the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Wisconsin will vote "yea" on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, does the question also involve the provision on page 16?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The two questions are considered together. The committee amendment was amended at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY] by unanimous consent, by inserting after the word "hops" in line 6, page 11, the words "not including the products thereof"; and on page 16, lines 11 and 12, after the word "hops", striking out the words "and their products."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, the committee included hops in this bill on the suggestion and at the request of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. McNARY]. I should like to know if there is any real division among the Senators from the hop-growing States with respect to this provision. I desire to ascertain their sentiments. I understand hops are produced in Oregon, Washington, and California. If there is a division of opinion on the question, I should like to know it.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. As I understand, the Senator from Alabama asked whether there was any division among the Senators representing the States in which hops are grown.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I will state that so far as the hop growers of the State of Washington are concerned, they are almost unanimously in favor of being included in the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. SMITH. Do I understand that the amendment on page 11, line 6, after the word "hops", to insert "not including the products thereof", has been agreed to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to by unanimous consent.

Mr. SMITH. Therefore, if we vote "yea", we vote to strike out the word "hops" with the amendment providing that the products thereof are not included.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMAS] are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is detained in a conference at the White House. I am advised that if present and voting he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARREN] is absent because of a death in his family, and that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT] are detained by important public business.

I announce further a general pair between the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DICKINSON]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote on this question.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] has been called from the Senate on official business. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 48, nays 34, as follows:

YEAS—48

Adams	Coolidge	La Follette	Reynolds
Bachman	Davis	Lewis	Russell
Borah	Dieterich	Logan	Schall
Brown	Donahey	Lonergan	Sheppard

NOT VOTING—13

Barbour	Couzens	Holt	Thomas, Utah
Black	Dickinson	Long	Thomas, Okla.
Copeland	Harrison	McCarran
Costigan	Hayden	Murphy

So Mr. DUFFY's amendment to the amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, while the senior Senator from South Carolina is on the floor, and in order that a question brought out by the bill may receive brief comment from him, I should like to ask him if he will turn to page 14 of the bill, at the bottom of the page? I understand that section (D), beginning in line 18, is probably desired by the majority of the milk producers of the country.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Has the Senator any objection to the pending committee amendment?

Mr. TYDINGS. I have not, except that the whole philosophy of the measure is involved in this provision, and I am using it in order to make an inquiry.

I am going to read, on page 14, line 18, section (D):

(D) Providing that, in the case of all milk purchased by handlers from any producer who was not, upon the effective date of such order, regularly selling milk for consumption in the area covered thereby, payments to such producer, for the period beginning with the first regular delivery by such producer and continuing for 3 full calendar months from the first day of the next succeeding month, shall be made at the price for the lowest use classification specified in such order.

In my State we have such an arrangement by agreement between the producers and the distributors, I understand, with the consumer being represented.

I am not attacking the merit or the wisdom of the provision. What I am asking is, can anyone show under what authority in the Constitution we have the right to fix the price of milk produced in South Carolina and sold in Charleston, S. C. Certainly, if the decision in the N. R. A. case is to apply to this bill, the bill is manifestly going to be held to be unconstitutional by the highest court, and all our work will have gone for naught.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if the Senator will turn to page 10, beginning with line 17, he will understand that the provision of the bill which he has just read is governed by this clause:

Only such handling of such agricultural commodity, or product thereof, as is in the current of interstate or foreign commerce, or as directly burdens, obstructs, or affects, interstate or foreign commerce in such commodity or product thereof.

I will state to the Senator that there are those here who are vitally interested in and who are a good deal more familiar with the complex question of milk handling and distribution than am I. I dare say that this matter gave the Agricultural Department, and certainly it gave the committee, more trouble and was worked on more diligently than any other provision of the bill. As the Senator says, in his State, in order to protect the regular customers, outsiders are not permitted to take advantage of any exigent condition and come in and destroy the market. This provision, of course, is subject to the limitation as to interstate commerce and also to the cooperation of the States, where they desire to cooperate. The provision does not in any way affect the right of any citizen to use all the markets available to him, but will be subject, of course, to the power under the Constitution to regulate interstate commerce.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thank the Senator from South Carolina, who has answered my question quite clearly.

I am not attacking the merits of a proposition of this kind; on the contrary, I can see ample reason for it, and I am not attacking the proposition as an enemy of what is sought to be done by that section of the bill. I am only attempting to point out that, in my humble and very fallible constitutional judgment—for I do not argue constitutional questions on this floor very often—that provision is not worth the ink which is necessary to print it, because the Congress has no more authority, whether the States agree or do not agree, to enforce a national law which attempts to fix the price of milk, we will say in Charleston, S. C., if that milk is produced in South Carolina. There is no warrant for it in any decision of the court of which I know and, therefore, in my judgment, we are writing something that in a year or a year and a half from now will find its way to the highest tribunal and in all likelihood it will be held to be invalid.

My purpose in bringing out this point—and it has already been discussed more or less on the floor—is to ascertain whether or not we want to take time to set up an agricultural policy which many men who are friendly to the philosophy of this particular section feel will not stand the test when the test comes.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am certainly not finding fault with the Senator in his constitutional argument on this question. If the Federal Government should undertake to do what the Senator has described and in Charleston fix the price of milk which was produced in South Carolina, it would be an unconstitutional undertaking. There is no intention to do such a thing.

The operation of the milk provision, as the chairman of the committee has said, is one of the most difficult things possible; but unless the milk business be regulated, the situation can become most harmful and disastrous to the producers. The Senator says those interested are operating in his State under an agreement just like the one here proposed.

Mr. TYDINGS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Davis went into considerable detail before the committee in discussing the situation. It is not intended that Mr. Davis, as administrator, or the Federal Government shall under any circumstances undertake any procedure which would affect the price of milk in intrastate markets unless it is done in cooperation with the State authorities.

Suppose, in the case the Senator stated, the Federal Government did not cooperate with the South Carolina authorities. Then those engaged in interstate commerce would in turn be able to put out of business the intrastate men. We thought this provision necessary in order to enable the interstate part of the milk market in Charleston to be controlled by the Federal Government, letting the intrastate part be controlled by the authorities of the State of South Carolina. By working in harmony they could produce good results. I believe the Senator from Maryland will admit that. There is no intention to do anything else.

Mr. TYDINGS. In view of the explanation made by the Senator from Nebraska, if it would work out that way——

Mr. NORRIS. I am not sure that it would, and I think no one can be sure; but I think the only way to find out is to try it.

Mr. SMITH. This is an attempt to make it work.

Mr. TYDINGS. My thought in reading that provision—and I did not necessarily connect it with the amendment on page 10—was that it would be silly, taking section (D) alone, for us to say we would do something which, when the question got into the courts, we would promptly find we were not able to do. My interest is not primarily to oppose the section, because in Maryland such a plan worked very well and has been fair to producer, distributor, and consumer under the agreement.

I am a little concerned, but I do not think it need be great concern, as to whether, if interstate shipments should not be included, they would affect to any great extent the existing agreement covering the intrastate milk business. However, I think that an effort has to be made to regulate interstate shipments, and in view of the explanation of the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Nebraska I shall not interpose further objection to the provision.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I did not exactly understand the explanation of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. Is it the intent to combine the two powers, interstate and intrastate, in seeking in any sense to control the intrastate action through the Federal Government.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is correct. The milk question is one of the most difficult to handle.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I realize that it is.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take the city of Baltimore, in the State of Maryland. It is desirable to regulate the sale of milk and not have somebody come in and put others out of business by first making too low a price and later raising it to a higher level. The State of Maryland can make regulations about the sale of milk in Baltimore if the milk is produced in Maryland. But if the milk is produced in South Carolina and shipped into Baltimore, then Maryland has no control over that interstate shipment.

If the Federal Government had no authority to go into the milk problem it could not help the State at all, but if it had such authority, and we seek to give it that authority here, then if the Federal authorities and the Maryland State authorities worked in harmony they could completely control the milk situation in Baltimore. As I understand, that is what the section is trying to accomplish. It is admitted to be difficult. It is admitted that it involves some close questions of constitutional law.

However, it is desirable and admitted on all hands, except perhaps by a few producers who might want to drive somebody else out of business, that we should have this regulation. The intention is for the Federal authorities, in a case like that of Baltimore, and in similar cases all over the United States in the larger cities, to get in touch with the State authorities and try to work in harmony with them to control the situation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee, as amended, on pages 11 and 16. Without objection, the amendments, as amended, are agreed to.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. It is proposed on page 29, after line 20, to insert the following new paragraph:

(B) No order shall be issued under this act prohibiting, regulating, or restricting the advertising of any commodity or product covered hereby, nor shall any marketing agreement contain any provision prohibiting, regulating, or restricting the advertising of any commodity or product covered by such marketing agreement.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, before we go to that, may I ask the status of the amendments on page 11 with which we were dealing?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that the hour having expired, the first amendment passed over is in order; and I ask that the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] be temporarily withheld until we dispose of the amendments which have been passed over. I refer now to the amendment on page 11, where the committee struck out "and not including fruits for canning."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. The debate by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] had ceased, and the Chair stated that the question was upon the adoption of the committee amendments, as amended, on pages 11 and 16, and that without objection they would be agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the Senate misunderstood the Chair. I was listening attentively to the statement by the Chair; and while the occupant of the chair has correctly stated his language, that immediately followed a vote simply eliminating hops; and I assumed that the purpose was to deal only with the part of the amendment on which the vote had been taken.

Mr. SMITH. The part of the amendment which was passed over was the amendment in reference to whether fruits for canning should be excluded or included.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; so if adverse action has been taken upon the amendment proposed by the Senate committee to the House text in line 4, page 11, I ask unanimous consent that it be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The language referred to by the Senator from Georgia in lines 4 and 5 of page 11 was not under consideration. Its consideration was suspended for 1 hour by unanimous consent. It is now before the Senate for consideration.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I do not know what action was taken a moment ago, or just what statement was made by the occupant of the Chair. The two products mentioned on page 11, line 6—soybeans and hops—were cared for by a vote of the Senate. The question now should recur upon the next item, package bees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment is in one clause. That clause was amended by striking out "hops." Then the question recurred on the amendment as amended, and it was adopted.

Mr. MCNARY. Oh, no; if that was done, it was not done with forethought.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not responsible for the forethought of Members of the Senate.

Mr. MCNARY. I am not responsible, either. I am now speaking about proper legislation and the form it should take. We all know that each one of these commodities must be acted upon deliberately and according to the rules. It is not possible, under the rules, to say from one page to another that action was taken. If such a thing does appear in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the action announced by the Chair was taken be vacated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Chair make a statement in answer to that suggestion.

The committee amendment under consideration was to insert the words "soybeans, hops, package bees and queen bees, poultry" before the words "and naval stores, as included in the Naval Stores Act and standards established thereunder." That was the committee amendment. It was amended by the Senator from Oregon by inserting, after the word "hops", the words "not including products thereof", which was agreed to. An amendment by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DUFFY] was adopted, striking out the word "hops."

Naturally, after being amended, the question recurred on whether or not the Senate would adopt the committee amendment as amended. The Chair stated that that was the question before the Senate, and that, if there was no objection, it would be adopted.

Now the Senator from Oregon has asked unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment as amended was adopted be reconsidered. Is there objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Oregon whether he objects to any of those items.

Mr. MCNARY. I may not object; other Senators may; but we cannot legislate in that wholesale fashion and have our action record the views of the majority of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, is the request of the Senator from Oregon merely that the committee amendment be reconsidered, but not the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. MCNARY. Oh, no; I am not trying to revive that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and the vote by which the amendment as amended was adopted is reconsidered. The question now is on the committee amendment, as amended.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I call attention to the fact that in the first paragraph on page 11, line 4, the committee struck out the words "and not including fruits for canning." That amendment was passed over for 1 hour for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] to be present at the time of its consideration. The hour now having elapsed, I ask that the amendment be considered at this time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the pending question before the Senate is on the adoption of the committee amendment just referred to as amended. Does the Senator desire to take up some other matter?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Since we reserved that amendment for separate consideration, would it be proper now to dispose of the italicized part beginning with "soybeans"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, then, the pending amendment will be temporarily set aside, and the question will recur on the amendment in line 4, page 11, striking out the words "not including fruits for canning." Is there objection to that? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of saying that I hope the Senate will reject this amendment and restore to the bill the original text as passed by the House.

In the first place, as it seems to me, there can be no real reason for including canned fruits within the operation of this bill, because, under the orders which the administrator is authorized to issue, the price of fruits to the grower or producer may be and can be fixed. Certainly under the committee amendment the producer's price can be fixed on the portion of the crop purchased by the canner as well as upon the portion of the crop of fruits covered by this bill that is disposed of as green fruits.

I do not think there can be any serious question about that; but if there is a question on the part of the proponents of the bill, or those who have it in charge, I respectfully invite attention to the provisions of the bill as they appear on page 18, line 13, subsection (F), which authorizes the fixing of a minimum price which anyone, including a canner, must pay to a grower for the raw material he purchases.

That this power is absolute, even though against the will of any and all canners, is clearly set forth in the bill on page 21, lines 3 to 25, inclusive, and page 22, lines 1 to 25, inclusive, and page 23, lines 1 to 6, inclusive.

The existence of such power is clearly evidenced on page 9 of the report of the committee itself; and it will be observed that canners may be brought under marketing agreements without their consent. It does not require cooperation.

I read from the report of the committee:

> Without such consent of the handlers to be covered thereby, a proposed order may become effective only if the Secretary of Agriculture, with the approval of the President, finds (1) that the failure of the requisite number of handlers to sign a marketing agreement, upon which a hearing has been held, tends to prevent the effectuation of the declared policy; (2) that the issuance of the proposed order is the only practicable means of carrying out the declared policy; and (3) that the issuance of the proposed order is approved or favored by at least two-thirds, by number or volume, of those producing the commodity for market.

So, Mr. President, so far as the price of green fruit is concerned, this bill authorizes the fixing of the price to the producer, and it authorizes the fixing of the price without the consent of the canner and against his will. Therefore there can be no legitimate reason for bringing the canners under the jurisdiction of the Department of Agriculture and of the A. A. A. Administrator, so far as the price to the producer of the fruit is concerned.

Is there any other legitimate purpose of the act? Is there any other just reason why a valuable food product should come under the jurisdiction of such an official, when it has paid to the producer the price that has been fixed under the law, and fixed even for the canner himself, and which he cannot avoid, because he may be involuntarily compelled to come within the terms of the order?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How can the price agreement be enforced on the canner unless he is subject to the orders?

Mr. GEORGE. How can a price agreement be enforced upon anybody?

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, pardon me. What is the question that was asked? We could not hear it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The Senator from Georgia, as I understood him, was making the argument that the price for the producer having been fixed, that price controlled the canner; he was obliged to pay the price fixed for the producer. The question I ask the Senator is how the canners can be obliged to pay the price if they are exempt from the operations of this measure.

Mr. GEORGE. They are not exempted from the operations of this measure. They are brought in against their will. They may be covered under the agreement upon the finding of three simple things which, of course, will be found. How is anybody going to be made to pay the price? If that is what the Senator means to ask, I desire to say frankly that it cannot be done, because the price of any article moving in interstate or intrastate business cannot be fixed unless it be affected with a public use.

However, I am waiving that question, which I am not arguing, I am saying that under the bill the price which must be paid to the producer of fruits is fixed, and it brings the canners who purchases fresh fruit under this provision, because here is a provision which expressly says that though a majority of the handlers do not agree, the Secretary of Agriculture, with the consent of the President, may bring them under the marketing agreement.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MURPHY in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. HATCH. I merely desire to ask a question, because I know the thought was expressed in the committee, as I recollect, that if the amendment proposing to strike out the words "not including fruits for canning" were rejected, that would constitute an exception of fruits for canning which would go throughout the entire bill, and all the orders and marketing agreements and prices to producers could not be fixed if the fruits were to be used for canning purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Of course; and that is the reason why I am asking that we reject this amendment, because there is no substantial necessity for including the canners when the price of the fruit to the producer is fixed.

Mr. HATCH. The point I was making is that the price would not be effective to the producer.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator tell me why it would not be effective if the price at which the fruit is to be sold to anybody will be effective?

Mr. HATCH. If the words "not including fruits for canning" were inserted in the bill as in the House measure, that would constitute an exception for all purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. HATCH. That was the thought expressed in the committee.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true, and that is why I am asking that this amendment be rejected. But the bill does authorize the fixing of the price to the producer. Then there is an effort made to bring the canner of fruits under the terms of the bill so that the price of the canned product itself may be fixed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Let me suggest to the Senator that it does not bring the canners under the bill except so far as the effect of the fruit for canning is concerned.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true, of course.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It does not bring the canners directly under it. The bill, as it passed the House, excepted fruits for canning, just as it excepted apples.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And therefore took them wholly out of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. That is, fruits for canning purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; fruits for canning, just as it did apples.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that if we leave the House language, then we eliminate entirely any program covering fruits used for canning purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. That is so far as controlling the price or making allocations are concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It just takes them out of the bill, just as apples have been taken out.

Mr. GEORGE. It does not take fruits out.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No.

Mr. GEORGE. But canners would not be brought within the bill if the House language were agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It would not. It is "fruits for canning", as the Senator from New Mexico pointed out.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true. I may not have made myself very clear.

Mr. HATCH. I am afraid I did not make myself clear.

Mr. GEORGE. I think I understand the Senator's position, and perhaps I was at fault because I did not make my own position clear. My position is that the price of fruits to the producer may be fixed under the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Except for canning purposes.

Mr. GEORGE. If the House language is taken, except for canning purposes. If the Senate amendment is taken, of course, even for canning purposes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They are fixed.

Mr. GEORGE. They are fixed for the producer.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is correct.

Mr. GEORGE. Let me ask the committee again, in order that I may understand the situation; if canners are brought under the bill, are not other provisions of the bill relating to handlers made applicable to the canners and to the products of the canners?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think so, so far as paying the price is concerned. I call the Senator's attention to the beginning of this section, on page 10:

COMMODITIES TO WHICH APPLICABLE

Orders issued pursuant to this section—

Which covers the whole order program—

Orders issued pursuant to this section shall be applicable only to the following agricultural commodities and the products thereof.

Certain ones are listed and then there appears the clause "and not including fruits for canning." So if the House language is left in the bill, as I previously pointed out, we simply eliminate entirely from the producer's standpoint and from every other standpoint all power of any sort to control, under this order program, fruits used for canning.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I am asking that the Senate reject the Senate committee amendment and let the House language stand, because I cannot see any practical necessity for the amendment that will equal or offset the very great disadvantages which may be placed upon consumers and may be placed upon the industry itself in sections of the country where the industry has not been developed by the adoption of the amendment made by the Senate committee to the House text.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it the Senator's contention that elsewhere in the bill there is an effort to control the price of fruit after it is canned?

Mr. GEORGE. Oh, yes; I think undoubtedly that is the effect of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. May I ask the Senator from Alabama if that is also his view?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think under the bill as it passed the House fruits for canning are entirely eliminated from the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator means if the Senate committee amendment is agreed to?

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I mean if we restore the language as the Senator desires, does he contend that the Secretary would then have jurisdiction over the price of the canned fruits?

Mr. GEORGE. That is the effect of the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not agree with that.

Mr. GEORGE. That is the effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The object is to give the producer the price.

Mr. GEORGE. The effect of it is also substantially to control the price of the canned goods.

Mr. CONNALLY. I see the Senator's point, but on the other hand, if we restore the language of the House, it would seem to me legally that it would absolutely operate to exclude from the operation of the law any fruit intended for canning.

Mr. GEORGE. It would.

Mr. CONNALLY. Therefore the Secretary could not, by agreement or otherwise, fix the price of the fruit, provided it was going to be used for canning.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true if the House text is taken.

Mr. CONNALLY. So there would be no control whatever.

Mr. GEORGE. That is true.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Department has control of that kind of fruit, inevitably it is going to react upon the price of other fruit, because if it is kept a little while it will deteriorate, and no longer be good for anything except probably for canning. Why could not the Senator accomplish his object by offering an amendment making it clear that after the fruit has once been canned then the Department shall have no jurisdiction over it? I am inclined to vote with the Senator on that, but I am not inclined to vote with him to exempt it because it is simply to be used for canning, for the canning industry is well organized, and if we remove any control of the price, it is going to play havoc with the producer. After anyone has bought it and paid the producer, he ought to be able to sell it in the market as he sees fit.

Mr. GEORGE. There are so many restrictions under the bill, allocations and marketing areas, that substantially the price is fixed. There can be no escape from that conclusion.

Mr. CONNALLY. Why could not the Senator use the language, "not including canned fruit", or "not including fruit after it is canned"?

Mr. GEORGE. I do not know how an appropriate amendment could be drawn unless there should be a general exception of canned fruits from the operation of the entire bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is not what the Senator is asking.

Mr. GEORGE. No; I am not.

Mr. CONNALLY. He is asking to exempt fresh fruits.

Mr. GEORGE. I am.

Mr. CONNALLY. If he will exempt canned fruit, I am with him.

Mr. GEORGE. I am asking first that fruits for canning be exempted from the act for the reason that the canned-fruit industry of this country is confined very largely to a small geographic area. If the growth of a fully matured man is fixed, it does not hurt him, but if his growth is arrested when he is a boy of 10 or 15, then he is destroyed. That is exactly what this bill does. It gives to a few, one or two of the Western States, a stranglehold upon the canning industry of the country. That is precisely what it does. That is what it is intended to do, in my honest opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator does not desire to misrepresent anyone, and when he says it is intended to do that thing, I want to object.

Mr. GEORGE. I do not mean by the committee, but I mean by those who have asked for this particular amendment.

When the bill was first presented to the Senate I inquired of the chairman of the committee as to who asked for the amendment. I am not imputing bad faith. It is simply the desire of those who virtually have a monopoly to keep it.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the Senator receive an answer to his question?

Mr. GEORGE. I received the answer that it originated with the committee, that is to say, that there was no particular person back of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I will be frank and state to the Senator that, so far as the action of the committee is concerned, the amendment striking out the words "and not including fruits for canning" was upon my motion. I am not ashamed of it. I do not apologize for it.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not asking the Senator to apologize for it; but the effect is to give to one or two States practically a control of canning or production of fruit for canning.

Mr. NORRIS. As a matter of fact, Mr. President, so far as I know, there is not a constituent in my State who has asked for it or written to me about it. I may be very ignorant and very dense, but I had no knowledge whatever as to any fruit industry in which my constituents may be interested. I was influenced by what, in my ignorance, I supposed to be a fair deal. It seemed to me, and it seems to me now, notwithstanding the very forceful argument and some insinuations——

Mr. GEORGE. I did not mean to make any insinuation, if the Senator from Nebraska will pardon me. I will withdraw any insinuation; but I repeat that the effect of the bill is to give one or two States a practical control of canning, in my opinion.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the Senator saying that, of course.

Mr. GEORGE. And I am proceeding with my argument on the theory that whenever an industry is fairly well developed within a given locality of the United States, to arrest the development of that industry in other sections of the United States is to continue the control enjoyed by the few States.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It will only take a sentence or two to let the Senator understand why I believe as I do. My belief is based entirely on the proposition that fresh fruit and canned fruit are to so great a degree in competition that I think, to be fair, they ought to be both included or both excluded. I would just as soon have both of them out as to have both of them in the bill. I am not speaking for any industry. However, if we put in one, we ought to put in the other, as I see it. If we take one out, we ought to take out the other. It is immaterial whether they are both in or both out.

Mr. GEORGE. I appreciate the Senator's view. The view, of course, which the Senator emphasizes is that if the price paid by the canner—who is one of the buyers, of course, of fruits—is to be free, fixed by him at his discretion or will, in accordance with general marketing conditions, we shall have altogether destroyed the purpose of including fruits in this provision of the bill. I can appreciate that.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the following provisions of the bill:

On page 16, at line 20, subdivision (A), there is authority for a limitation upon the total quantity of canned fruit or the quantity of any grade or size of canned fruit which a canner may transport or market. I have not any doubt that it will be so construed. This comes under the " orders ", it is true; but if this language remains in the bill the canner may be brought under and made subject to the orders without his consent, merely if the given number of producers ask it—not all the canners. So that the orders to be issued by the Secretary, with the approval of the President, against the will of all the fruit canners, necessarily under this particular subdivision, in these particular lines and page, may be construed to limit the total quantity of canned fruit or the quantity of any grade or size of canned fruit which a canner may transport or market.

Then, again, under subsection (B), page 17, line 1, there is authority to limit the quantity, grade, or size of fruit which any canner may purchase from producers.

Again, at page 17, line 12, subdivision (C), there is authority to allot the amount of canned fruit which any canner may market in each and all markets by sizes and grades or otherwise.

Then, on page 18, line 1, subdivision (D), authority is given to determine the existence and extent of any surplus in the hands of a canner or canners and to take over the control and distribution of such surplus.

On page 18, at line 9, subsection (E), authority is given to establish reserve pools of any canning fruit or any canned fruit and distribute the net returns from such pools.

If the language remains in the bill, as I have attempted to argue in the first instance, subsection (F), line 13, page 18, provides for fixing the minimum price which the canner must pay to a grower for the raw material he purchases; and the power is made absolute, and without the consent of canners, but only upon condition that a specified percentage of the producers of the fruit themselves ask the Secretary of the Treasury and the President to issue the order covering the canners.

Mr. President, I believe that approximately 90 percent, let us say, of asparagus is canned in a single State. The same thing is true, varying only in degree, when other fruits are considered. If approximately 90 percent of a given fruit is canned in a single State, under this bill the industry cannot expand, except in a like proportion, if at all, in the other sections of the United States. That does not seem to me to be fair. It does not seem to me to be just. It does not seem to me to be right, even though the purpose of the bill may be, by the insertion of this particular amendment, to give to the producer a fixed price for his product. In other words, even though the purpose of the bill may be entirely consistent with the object in view and with the original act, and may be altogether desirable, it cannot be necessary to give that advantage to a State which already possesses a virtual monopoly so far as canned fruits are concerned.

To illustrate, let us take the case of peaches, or the case of asparagus, or of citrus fruits, save that the State of Florida has very rapidly become a great canner of citrus fruits.

Now, Mr. President, it becomes necessary for me to speak plainly, and I propose to speak plainly. The Pure Food and Drug Division of the Department of Agriculture has within the last 10 years virtually outlawed peaches canned in Georgia. They did it not upon the ground that the peaches were not good, not that they were not pure, not that they were not wholesome, not that they were not edible, not that they did not possess all the qualities, and perhaps additional ones, of the California peach—I regret to refer to any State, but I must make this argument clear—but they did it upon the ground that in point of appearance the Georgia peaches had to carry a label which virtually excluded Georgia canned peaches from the market, and from that hour canning in Georgia, although it is a great peach-producing State, was arrested. Why? Because this department of government, the Department of Agriculture, or those acting under it, were administering the law partially, notwithstanding the fact that delegation after delegation of representatives and senators came here and protested against the requirement that we must put upon our canned fruit a label which would necessarily result in excluding Georgia canned peaches from the markets.

Senators may say that we may rely upon the Department not to be unfair. I assert now that the Department of Agriculture 10 years ago was unfair and seriously crippled the canning industry of my State with respect to one of its important products. I assert now that they admitted that the Georgia peach was not only as good as any other, but that it possessed qualities which were not possessed by some other peaches; but the Department had their own peculiar standards, and those who had most voice in fixing those standards, and the men who administered the law for the most part did not come from Georgia, had never been in Georgia, and knew nothing about Georgia industry.

One can so easily make partial rules and regulations, and it is so difficult, so very difficult, to meet them, and it is impossible to get a bureau to change its decisions. It will not do it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator's position is that the language on page 16, line 6, " and not including fruits for canning ", should likewise be rejected?

Mr. GEORGE. That would follow, if the committee amendment were rejected on line 4, page 11.

Mr. President, I have never before made an argument of this kind.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GEORGE. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Georgia asserted that the Department has been unfair and is unfair. I do not think the Senator need produce any lengthy argument to demonstrate that contention. To read this bill is sufficient to convince any man who thinks directly of things instead of around things that it is not fair. No American who wishes to be fair will vote to impose a tax of doubtful validity and then urge Congress to deny the citizen the right to go into the courts and test the validity of that tax. I thank the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. I thank the Senator from Arizona for his observation.

Mr. President, I have said that I have never before made an argument of this kind in the Senate. I hesitate to make it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order to have the point clearly in my mind, let me ask the Senator a question. I understand his statement to be that the unfair administration to which he referred was in connection with the Pure Foods and Drugs Act?

Mr. GEORGE. I was merely illustrating by that suggestion.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I refer to the particular application which the Senator made as affecting Georgia.

Mr. GEORGE. The particular illustration which I gave related to Georgia.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under laws which are now on the statute books?

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; under laws which are now on the statute books.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So the law of which the Senator is complaining is already in existence?

Mr. GEORGE. That is true, but this provision will bring canned fruits under the control of the Department if the committee amendment shall be agreed to. I am trying to call to the Senator's attention the provision of the bill which, through allocation, limitation, and restriction, makes it possible to confine the development of the canning industry within those localities or geographical areas in which that industry has already been very largely developed. I do not say completely developed, because the development may, of course, continue; but the progress of the canning industry in the United States has been most seriously hampered because of the partial interpretations which have been made, particularly as to fruits, and also as to some vegetables, as I recollect, under provisions of the Pure Foods and Drugs Act.

Mr. President, who do this? The fresh-fruit market is not, as a rule, controlled by the price paid by canners. The contrary is true, generally speaking, of the Southeast, at least, though I would not say that it is true universally. The supporting element in the market of the Southeast is the canner. He is the man who will contract in advance for fruits, and in some instances for vegetables, and will agree to pay a price. He is the man who, very largely, makes it possible for us to carry on the industry in our section. There is always the canner when the fresh-fruit market goes to pieces and the producers are not able to sell their fruits on that market. I will illustrate my thought. When it comes to melons, let us say, the canning of which has not as yet developed in the Southeast, there is virtually no market upon which the producer may put any reliance or dependence. Time after time in the memory of every man who has grown melons of any kind in the Southeast the producers have loaded their melons onto the cars, unloaded them, and given them away. That is not true in the case of green vegetables where a cannery is available; it is not true where there is some support for the fresh-fruit market. It is not true in the case of asparagus; it is not true in the case of peaches, and would be far less true if the peach-canning industry were further developed; but in the case of melons and fruits, for the canning of which no facilities have been developed, the market is substantially without support, and that market is frequently not only disorganized but it is often destroyed in the midst of a growing or marketing season. So the producers of fruits and vegetables, at least, in the Southeast, will, in my judgment, be seriously hurt if the canners shall be brought under the conditions and terms of this bill. Why?

Canned fruits and canned vegetables in large measure are the fruits and vegetables which are used and consumed by the poor and by those who have but moderate purchasing power.

The greater quantity of our canned fruits and vegetables go into the homes of people of very moderate means. They become almost the only source of supply of fruits and vegetables for many of our people whose purchasing power has been greatly reduced.

Why add to that burden? Why advance the cost of these necessities of life? Why do so when, so far as the fresh-fruit market is concerned, the price may be fixed without reference to this particular amendment? So far as the bill goes, the price may be absolutely fixed to the producer, and anyone who is buying from the producer must pay that price.

It is true, A or B or C, canner or individual, cannot be compelled to buy at that price, but the price is fixed, and the producer is given the benefit of that fixed price; he has his products in his hands, and he may take advantage of that situation to prevent, reasonably at least, any unjust combination on the part of canners to beat down the price of his product and to buy it below the market.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is familiar with the condition in Florida, where we produce grapefruit and oranges in connection with which, particularly in the case of grapefruit, a considerable canning industry has been developed. The Senator knows—and I think he will bear me out in the statement—that much of the fruit used for canning the juice is just as good and healthy and wholesome as is the fresh fruit, but is not available for the fresh-fruit market on account of some discoloration or other defect that interferes with the appearance of the fruit. So such fruit is not afforded a market as fresh fruit, but its use is confined to canning purposes. If the canner should be eliminated and could not take from the grower such fruit, the grower would lose the entire product and would have no market.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Florida is entirely correct. Every person who is familiar with Florida fruit knows that the portion of the citrus fruit crop which goes to the canner to have the juices extracted and canned is perhaps the very best part of that crop in point of fact; but, because it does not meet some standard requirement, of course it is not put on the market in competition with the fresh fruit.

I do not think it can be emphasized too strongly, Mr. President, that the poor of this country, as a rule, cannot pay the prices charged for green vegetables and fresh fruits. They must, very largely, at least, depend upon the canning industry to supply them with their necessary fruits and vegetables.

I would not make the plea that the grower of fruits is not entitled to a fair and just price; but when he is given the power to fix the price of his fresh fruits, and, with that power in his hands, he has also the power to organize, it does seem unfair to a great mass of the consumers of the country that we are asked by the committee amendment to place the canners under the bill, to regulate and control the canners, and therefore, in effect at least, to control and regulate the price to all consumers.

Mr. President, I wish to repeat that under this bill and under the particular subsections to which I have called attention I believe there can be no doubt that the orders which may be imposed without the consent of the canner—bear that in mind; against his will in fact—can and will limit the total quantity of canned fruit or the quantity of any grade or size of canned fruit which the canner may transport or market. If that be so, we may expect a very sharp and rapid advance in the prices paid by those who consume canned fruits and vegetables. If that be so, we may expect those States that already have a fully developed industry to be able practically to prevent the spread and expansion of that industry into other States. Under this bill and under the particular subsection to which I call attention, the order may limit the quantity or the grade or size of fruit which any canner may purchase from a producer. It does not make any difference about the quality of the fruit; its size may be the determining factor. Furthermore—and this is most important—the amount of canned fruit which any canner may market in each market may be alloted. When we write such a provision in this bill we stifle the industry in any other State where it is being developed or is in process of development.

Mr. President, I earnestly hope that the committee amendment will be disagreed to and that the House text will be restored to subsection 2 of section 8 (c) on page 11 of the bill, and that the corresponding amendments which will then, of course, be necessary may be made in subsequent sections of the bill, to which the Senator from Florida has directed attention.

Mr. President, I wish that every section of this Union had an equal voice in the administration of its laws; I wish that were true, but I would not be candid with the Senate if I did not say that not an important office, not an office carrying policy-fixing power in the division that will administer this proposed provision of the bill, is held by any man from my State.

Mr. KING. Or any man elected by the people.

Mr. GEORGE. Yes; or by any man elected to office. That will be the story over and over again. It may not be an argument that should be made, but it is the fact. With a State now canning within its borders 89 percent of the canned asparagus, and having a correspondingly high percentage of other fruits and vegetables grown and canned within its borders, and with a bill here which simply puts the halter around the neck of the industry to prevent its expanding in any other part of the country, I think the South and Southeast—I even feel emboldened to say a single State—may properly come to the Senate and ask that this provision be stricken out of the bill and the House text retained by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is very natural that the distinguished Senator who has just taken his seat should speak on this question from the standpoint of the State which he represents. It is equally natural that I should speak from the standpoint of the State I represent.

I express my very deep regret that the Senator's State has been treated in the fashion he suggests in respect to the glorious peach which he described. I would go with him any length in order to rectify a wrong of that sort or to do aught that might be done to see that justice be accorded him, and accorded him most fully. But, sir, the objections he presents to the amendment here before us, an amendment which is submitted by the committee after due deliberation, are not in reality objections to the amendment. The objections he has are objections to the bill. As I followed him in what he has said in that regard, he insists that the administration of the bill by those who may not be familiar with his particular territory is what he fears may result in wrong in his territory or what he fears may result in injury to the industries of his State.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JOHNSON. I yield.

Mr. KING. I do not want to misunderstand the Senator. My understanding of the basis of the argument of the Senator from Georgia—and I came in from a committee meeting just before he concluded—was that he was pleading not only for his State, but to have a uniform rule throughout the United States, namely, that fruit which is canned should not come within the operations of the bill. He did not confine it to his State alone, but to all States, including the State of the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, let me suggest that I would not for the world misstate what was said or indulge in any intent to cause misapprehension of what was said by the Senator from Georgia. I think that accurately I stated the conclusion which might have been drawn from the remarks he made.

However that may be, the committee comes here with an amendment which we believe ought to be sustained. It is an amendment which puts fruits which are canned in the same category as other fruits—fruits which are not canned. That that should be so, anyone familiar with the fruit industry ought, it seems to me, readily admit.

In some States, I grant, there is not a friendly feeling between the canners on the one side and producers on the other. In other States, I grant, there is a relationship between canners on the one side and producers on the other which may render them desirous of carrying out the views of either one side or the other.

In the State from which I come the fruit industry is so great that interrelated are the proceedings and the sales and the activities of green fruits and those which subsequently may be canned. That the fears of the canner are wholly fanciful will be demonstrated by a knowledge of what is sought to be done by the bill in the provision under discussion. We seek, in this particular provision, relating to commodities to which the bill may be applicable, to list those things which will come within the purview of the bill. These provisions relate to marketing agreements.

Marketing agreements can be made only if 50 percent of the canners in the one instance shall agree or two-thirds of the growers or producers in the other instance shall demand it. If, as in the State of Georgia, the producers are in such relationship to the canners that they feel their interests are one, no marketing agreement can ever be consummated, because two-thirds of the growers are required in order that it shall be consummated or, on the other hand, one-half of the canners.

If, in a State like that from which I come, there are differences existing between the canners on the one hand and the growers on the other, exactly the same situation prevails. Marketing agreements, therefore, need never be feared by any State where canners and growers are in accord and where they are acting in concert, as the Senator from Georgia would indicate they are acting in concert in his State.

What is more reasonable? I am not going to argue the merits of the bill nor speak of those provisions concerning which the Senator from Georgia has spoken, which, in his opinion, make the bill one which ought not probably be passed. I am not going to argue now in reference to any of those provisions which he thinks may be administered by those who are not familiar with his particular territory. But I ask, if we adopt this measure, if we make it applicable to agricultural products, on what theory shall we make it applicable to a part of the fruit-raising agricultural productivity of particular States and not applicable to other parts?

Where such quantities of fruit are produced, as in my State, of course we must take into consideration in any legislation relating to the subject matter not alone the green fruit which is but a part of that which is raised, but the very great and considerable quantity of canned fruit which results therefrom. It is perfectly obvious that if we deal with only a moiety of fruit thus produced and do not deal with the other part of the fruit thus produced, we will have chaos so far as marketing conditions are concerned and difficulty under a bill such as is presented here today.

Much was said by the Senator from Georgia about production in a single State. What of it? I cannot see that it is either something that is derogatory to a State or something that should be apologized for by anybody coming from that State. I have no apology, of course, to make in that regard. Consider the fruits and other commodities which are canned in this country. All the canned apricots are produced in the State of California; all the canned olives are produced in the State of California; from 97 to 99 percent of the canned peaches are produced in the State of California. What State, therefore, has a greater interest in this bill and in the endeavor to give a market to that which comes from the soil than has the State which thus produces and thus cans such an extraordinary proportion of that which is consumed in and that which is exported from the United States? So, with the knowledge of what is done in the State of California, with its productivity conceded and admitted, with the statistics demonstrating just what I have said, why should not the State of California stand here and express its views as well as the State of Georgia upon a subject matter of this character, which means such extraordinary things in the agricultural life of that State?

Something was said by my friend from Georgia about asparagus. Do Senators realize where the greatest amount of asparagus is canned in this country? In California, in 1934, 1,914,000 cases were canned. Do Senators realize what percentage that is of all the asparagus that was canned in the United States? It is 89 percent of all that was canned in the United States.

So, of course, I endeavor to present an amendment here in relation to asparagus by which it shall be in a different category from vegetables generally, as stated in the clause on page 11 of the measure; and I present it because the asparagus growers desire it; and I state here on behalf of the fruit growers of the State of California, who produce such an extraordinary proportion of the canned fruits of this Nation, that they desire that their product, when it goes into the cannery, shall be put upon a parity with their product when it is of a different character, and that it shall be treated under this bill exactly as all fruits are treated under the bill. There is nothing in that which strikes me as being in the slightest degree something that ought not to be done, nor anything that requires caviling or criticism from any source, of any character, or under any circumstances.

What is it that is desired? Solely that as the process goes on with the fruits of the State, as they are finally canned in such an extraordinary amount, that product shall be in exactly the same relationship to the law it is sought to pass as the remainder of the fruit may be.

That is all there is to this amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I understand that as the House passed this bill it was provided that fruits for canning purposes should not be included within the provisions of the measure. The Senate committee proposes to amend the bill by striking out that provision, which would subject fruits for canning purposes to the imposition of the various rules and regulations contained in the bill.

In Florida the canners have succeeded in making remarkable progress during a period of some 10 or 15 years since the industry was established in that State, and I understand they are getting along nicely at the present time in spite of the depression. The fruit growers of the State have made no complaint whatever that the present Agricultural Adjustment Act does not apply to fruits for canning purposes. This amendment seeks to require that all the fruits used in canneries shall be subjected to the terms of the bill, just the same as the fruit that is placed on the general market.

I am unable to see why the fruits sold to the canneries should be subjected to these provisions. In my State both the producers and the canners are against having them included. There is a difference in the grade of fruit used for canning and that shipped in to the general market.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks it is unreasonable to provide a plan under which the producer may get a decent price for his fruits, even though they are bought for the cannery?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The producers are very well satisfied with the present plan. Of course, if we are going into details, I will say that in my State they did go under this proposal to obtain decent prices, as the Senator states. They did not obtain decent prices. They have become weary of the system and have withdrawn from the system. That is the result among the producers in Florida. They have withdrawn from it.

It is one thing to say we are going to get decent prices for the producers, that we are going to promote the interests of agriculture, and we are going to promote the interests of the fruit growers; but obtaining those beneficent results is another thing. I cannot go into details, but I know that the people of my own State have decided that they were getting no benefits by reason of the trade agreements affecting fruits being under the provisions of the present law; and the citrus-fruit growers of Florida generally, producing under ordinary circumstances approximately 36,000,000 boxes of fruit per annum, have recently withdrawn from such agreements.

There is no one from my State who is asking for this amendment. The producers are perfectly content and satisfied to remain outside of the bill, and they are satisfied to be let alone in regard to the fruit which is supplied to the canner.

The canners in my State have been a great aid to the citrus-fruit growers, the pineapple growers, and others. They have purchased a great quantity of fruit and utilized it in that way, and thus have removed the necessity for placing such a great surplus of fresh fruits in the usual channels of trade. I do not know of any reason whatever for this measure, by means of which we are trying to assist the agricultural interests of the country, except that there are surpluses that have to be cared for.

That is true of cotton; that is true of wheat; that is true in regard to fruits. The question of proper, systematic marketing at least comes into it; and I myself, conforming to the wishes of the producers of my State, hope that the Senate will reject the amendment proposed by the Senate committee and allow the text to stand just as it was in the House bill as it came to the Senate.

I am speaking, of course, as one of the representatives here of a very large fruit-producing State; but many States prepare for market different kinds of fruits. To say that every time a producer in one of the various States throughout the Union proposes to sell fruit to canners for canning purposes he shall have to place his head in the halter and go through the process required by this bill is, in my opinion, an absurdity. The producers should not be required to subject themselves to the provisions of the measure, which is intended to apply to general industries needing assistance from the Government.

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York allow me at this point to call attention to what seems to be a misapprehension of the whole procedure, with particular respect to citrus fruits?

There are three independent sections, not treated collectively but treated separately: the Florida section, the Rio Grande—that is, the Texas—section, and the California section. Neither one of these, except with the consent of the majority of the producers, comes under the terms of the bill. It was brought out, as anyone reading the hearings will find verified, that at any time, even during the marketing season, when a majority of the producers say, "We want to withdraw", all they have to do is to take a vote and they are out. If they want to come in, they can take a vote and come in. There is nothing arbitrary about it. There is no noose for anyone to put his head into unless he makes the noose and puts his head into it.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. McADOO. The Senator is addressing himself now to the citrus-fruit provision?

Mr. SMITH. I refer to the provisions of the bill as to canners—any provisions which affect those three sections.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield? The Senator says this is voluntary. I wish to repeat what I said the other day, that the licenses or orders provided for can be imposed by the votes of 50 percent of the handlers of any given commodity without the votes of the producers.

Mr. SMITH. The Senator is referring to a section to which he has offered an amendment, which I think is a very good one. That refers to a portion of the bill which does not affect this provision. The Senator is referring to the provision requiring certain handlers to reach an agreement, and the votes of 50 percent of them are necessary; and he has offered an amendment including a certain percentage of the producers under that particular paragraph. I have reference now to the question of canning fruits and vegetables. This all comes under the general head of an agreement on the part of the growers. If they vote themselves out, they are out. If they vote themselves in, they are in.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I desire to repeat that the bill does not give to the growers the power to vote themselves in. It gives to 50 percent of the handlers the power to determine whether or not marketing agreements shall be entered into.

Mr. SMITH. That is in relation to the handlers in interstate commerce.

Mr. BYRD. That is in reference to the entire marketing agreements which we are now discussing under the amendments.

Mr. SMITH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, if the Senator will read his own report, on page 3, he will find this statement:

> Under the proposed amendments it is made clear that the Secretary must issue an order whenever the handlers of 50 percent by volume of the commodity to be covered in the order have signed a marketing agreement regulating the handling of such commodity.

Mr. SMITH. Precisely; having reference entirely to the handlers, when it is a question of orders that govern the handlers.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, with all due deference to the Senator, he is mistaken about that. The orders which are promulgated regulate the producers just as well as they do the handlers. Under this provision the handlers may initiate the orders whereby the producers will be restricted as to what they shall do, and the Senator's own report plainly so declares.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, that has reference entirely to the question of the handlers in marketing. It is absurd to say that an agreement on the part of the handlers has reference to the marketing agreements of the producers. They are two distinct things.

In reference to the particular point at issue, namely, the citrus-fruit question and the production in certain regions, I call attention to the objection of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. He sent to the committee a letter which we discussed. In the letter he did not indicate that the provision as to citrus fruit would cover all the citrus fruit produced in this country.

It was made clear, and it is so indicated, that Florida is distinct, and is treated as a distinct unit. The Rio Grande production is a distinct unit, as is that of California. So that whatever agreement may be reached in California will not affect Florida or the Rio Grande.

Mr. President, I do not want any misapprehension to be entertained in regard to the bill. On page 22 this language occurs:

> That the issuance of such order is the——

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, may I ask whether I still have the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair). The Chair was in some doubt. The Senator from New York was recognized.

Mr. COPELAND. There was nothing for the Senator from New York to do but to subside. I used to believe we had rules here which protected debate, but apparently they do not now exist. However, I yield to the Senator from South Carolina to go on indefinitely, and sometime I will try to get the floor on my own account.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, with abject apology to the Senator from New York, I yield the floor, and will allow him to take it at his pleasure. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. I would not have denied the Senator from South Carolina the opportunity to make a speech.

Mr. SMITH. I thought it was a courtesy which was extended to the chairman of the committee on a very important point, which he was very ably elucidating for the benefit of the Senate. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. I will say one more disagreeable thing. If the Senator from South Carolina the next time will ask whether I am willing to yield I shall be glad to yield to him, but I dislike being swept off the floor, as happens too commonly in the Senate. Either we ought to proceed in an orderly fashion or just have a pow-wow all the time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I apologize and humbly retire.

Mr. COPELAND. The apology is accepted with pleasure.

Mr. President, I am sorry that I represent a constituency which cannot give its full support to this particular measure. If I represented some other constituency, perhaps I could think this bill was wise, but when I know that the enactment of the bill would increase the cost of living and make greater the misery of countless citizens in my State, and particularly in the city where I live, where there is more unemployment than anywhere else, there being there 2,000,000 unemployed, I feel impelled to rise and say a word or two about it.

I know the bill means that every barrel of flour the people buy will cost $1.50 more, that every pound of meat will cost 4 to 5 cents more, and that everything the people consume will be increased in cost, as, indeed, costs have been increased by the law which is now sought to be extended.

Mr. President, I now come to the matter which has been so ably presented by the Senator from Georgia that it seems silly for me to say even a word about it, but we cannot ride through the country anywhere in the fall, when fruits are ripe, without seeing the tremendous waste. Fruits are permitted to drop off the trees and bushes and to rot upon the ground.

Why should there be imposed upon the fruits which may be used for canning another burden of tax in order to prevent their use for such purpose? I wish everybody in the United States could have fresh fruit and fresh vegetables every day of the year, but that, unfortunately, is not possible. Many people are too poor to have fresh fruits and vegetables, taken from refrigerated cars or from refrigerators. They depend upon canned fruits and canned goods of other kinds. That is America. The chief equipment of a home in the United States is the can opener, and every household depends upon canned goods.

An effort is being made to impose a burden upon the food of the poor, and, so far as I am concerned, if I were the only one, I should stand up to resent it and to oppose it. It is not right that we should do it, and I can see no reason why we should do it.

Granting for the moment that it is proper to include under the terms of the bill fine, perfect fruits, that is one thing, but to include those fruits which are to be canned and used in the homes of the poor of the United States, to my mind is a crime against humanity, and I want to enter my solemn protest against the procedure.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, in answer to what the Senator from Virginia has called attention to, I was about to read from the bill, and I hope all Senators who are interested will read the text of the bill.

I do not care to enter into any argument at all as to the necessity for including canned fruits and vegetables under the terms of the law, for the reason that the canning of fruits and vegetables constitutes as much their marketing by those who produce them in the raw state as does the marketing of fresh fruits and vegetables.

As to fruits and vegetables being obtained in the canned form for the poor, I do not think it is necessary for me to call attention to the fact that the most notoriously poor people, who actually produce the volume of wealth of this country, are the farmers. The people who produce the vast majority of the wealth of the country, the material out of which the wealth is made, are the farmers, and they are the most notoriously universally poor of all those who actually produce wealth. The volume of the production of the people who produce the material out of which we are all clothed is the underlying foundation upon which our organized society rests.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Was the Senator ever in a tenement house?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I have been, and I am here to state that by some strange psychology there are thousands of people who would rather stay in a metropolitan center, in a tenement house infested with rats and vermin, than to go out and make an honest living in the country. Everybody knows that to be so.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMITH. There is a stigma attached to farming. The farmer is called the "old hayseed" and the "old farmer." He is the butt of every caricature; he is the sign and symbol of ignorance and incompetency. Thousands of people think it is a disgrace and a lowering of social status to be either classified with or to come into social contact with a farmer.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SMITH. No; I am speaking well, and I do not want to be interrupted. [Laughter.]

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to give the Senator an example. I was born on a farm, so I am an example of exactly what the Senator is talking about.

Mr. SMITH. Judging from the Senator's speech, I am afraid he has become an apostate. I will illustrate my point. I am just back from the Senate restaurant. There was not an article on the table that was not produced by those who could ill afford to eat the quality of the things we ate in the restaurant. We might just as well face this thing at one time as another and settle it, if possible.

The farmers of this country are the Chinese of America's organized society. What would happen if in this day of strikes the farmers were to combine and for 12 months strike and not sell a single article produced on the farm? I wonder what effect it would have. I wonder what would be the result. Labor sometimes strikes, and produces disastrous financial and social results; but what would become of the great metropolitan centers of the country if the farmers, in self-respect and self-protection, were to strike and refuse to sell any of the products of the field? Because of their unorganized condition and helpless financial condition, however, they are disregarded here.

We came here and asked for $100,000,000 to help the farmers stay on the farm and make a living for themselves and their dependents. Congress did not provide that amount for them. We proposed to loan the money to them and take a lien on their crops. We haggled about the amount until we cut it down to $60,000,000; and, in spite of the disastrously low prices and the terrific conditions under which they produced, the farmers paid back 99 percent of the money loaned them. Yet, on the other hand, without batting an eye, we appropriated $5,000,000,000, the greater portion of which is to be handed out to those who have not produced and will not produce a single thing for the convenience and advantage of our economic and industrial and organized social life!

I am amazed, as I sit here, that there should be such an attitude as has been exhibited toward organizing some kind of resistance so that the man who produces the material which feeds and clothes the country may have some little opportunity to share in the wealth he produces; yet he is shot at from every side.

Mr. President, with all the opportunities in America for one to make at least a subsistence, it comes with ill grace for any Senator to stand on this floor and demand that the farmer shall still be denied any opportunity to live decently and comfortably in order that those who live in the slums may be provided with a little better living.

I begged Senators when they started to consider this bill to consider it farmer-minded. A majority of us have been away from the farm too long to appreciate the terrible conditions under which the farmers live. I hope this bill will be considered as an attempt to help the helpless; to create a line of resistance where now there is no line of resistance; and if, in the judgment of the Senate, there are provisions of the bill which are not beneficial, and are not sufficient to give the farmer, in his unorganized condition, a chance in this superorganized world, let Senators offer amendments, but let them not come with destructive criticisms.

Because the farmer is not organized and cannot, in an organized body, demand what he wants at the ballot box, he is disregarded. We should sing a different song if he were organized and could speak with an organized backing. We know what the result would be if the farmers were organized.

I am not going to draw any comparisons, but every colleague I have on this floor knows that when certain organizations speak they are heard because they are organized. In their case it is not a question of justice and equity and no discrimination; it is a question of whether or not they will have a telling number of votes if we should dare oppose their demands.

I am pleading here today for a square deal; not a new deal but a square deal, an honest deal; that we on our part shall recognize the condition of the farmer as compared to others, and give him a chance.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, does not the Senator think a square deal would be a new deal?

Mr. SMITH. The Senator has hit it. Yes; I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I confess that I am very much surprised at some of the argument which has been used in relation to this particular committee amendment, and that I am surprised at the heat and even anger which is shown in debate in opposition to this committee amendment. I am surprised there should be such feeling, inasmuch as it seems to me there has never been the slightest idea or tinge of an unfair or dishonest motive actuating the committee in proposing the amendment. It seemed to me that yesterday, and to some extent today, there was amazement in the minds of some Senators that any committee should dare to bring in an amendment of this kind, and there seemed to be an effort to search out who was guilty of proposing such an amendment. It developed only today, upon my own confession, that I was the guilty party who offered this amendment in the committee.

I was dumfounded, when listening to the debate, to hear some of the reasons which were given in opposition to this amendment—reasons which I had never heard of before, which had never occurred to me as existing, and I do not now know why they are offered or why they should exist. Of all the committee deliberations in which I have taken part since I have been a Member of this body or of the House of Representatives I do not recall a single instance, Mr. President, where there seemed to be such an honest endeavor on the part of the committee to do what was right in framing a very difficult piece of legislation. So far as I observed, no one was trying to intimidate the committee; no one representing the Department even tried to suggest how any member of the committee should vote.

I had no constituents interested in this committee amendment, so far as I know. So far as I was concerned, I knew that in my own heart I was moved by no desire to help one industry or to hurt another one. It occurred to me, on the face of the House language in the bill, that there would often be injustices if that language were permitted to remain in the bill.

It is charged that the canning industry is organized. The growers are not so well organized, and in regard to some products they are not organized at all. So if there was any undue advantage attempted to be taken, it was perhaps attempted on the part of the canners. I am not making such a charge, but if such an attempt were made, it would be more apt to be made by the canners.

A Senator can go into the Senate Restaurant and, I presume, get a fresh grapefruit. He probably can get canned grapefruit at the same time. If he cannot get it at that restaurant, he can get it from almost any grocery dealer in the city of Washington. Fresh grapefruit and canned grapefruit are in competition at this moment The House language which this amendment strikes out regulates one and lets the other go free. I submit that is not fair. No matter what industries Senators have in their respective States or what their interests are, that is not fair. It is like saying to a man who produces oranges, "We will regulate you, but we will not regulate your neighbor."

So it seemed to me that the producers of fresh fruits and of canned fruits ought to be treated alike. I have nothing against either one of them; I have not, directly or indirectly, politically, or in any other way, any interest whatever in the question; but it seems to me, in order to be fair, to regulate one, with the tendency probably sometimes to increase his expenses, and to put no burden whatever upon the other producer would be unfair. So I said include both in the regulation or exclude both from it, and I say that now.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask whether or not the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry was divided on the question of bargaining agreements for fresh fruits?

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think there was no disagreement.

Mr. President, that reminds me that we ought to consider what kind of a bill is the measure pending before us. In the main, it is a bill to assist the producers—the farmers and other producers, if they are not all classified as farmers—to give them a square deal, as the chairman of the committee said; and in order to do it, it is deemed proper, if possible, to have them organized on a basis by which they may prevent unfair and ruinous competition amongst themselves. That is the secret of all production, whether it be of wheat, corn, cotton, fruit, or anything else. That may be wrong. If it be wrong, then the whole policy is wrong; and every attempt to regulate and to help production with the idea of producing prosperity where there is now depression is wrong. It ought, however, to be a sufficient answer to say that in various laws which we have passed we have adopted the theory of helping the producer of food products, and that includes the producer of fruit. We realize that what the Senator from New York said is true in the case of fruit, for instance, and in other lines also; one may go into sections of the country where the fruits are produced and find tons of them rotting on the ground. When we are talking about the poor man, the man who is producing that fruit, we find he has not been able to find a market, perhaps because in some other locality so much fruit has been produced that it cannot be consumed, and he is ruined. That, after all, if one desires to analyze it, is the source, to a great extent, of unemployment.

The pending measure is founded on the theory of helping the producers to avoid such overproduction as will bring ruin to the producers themselves as well as to the consumers; that we shall all go down together if we go down. If the producers and the canners of fruit are competitors in the very nature of their business, then if we regulate the one and let the other go unregulated, we are unfair, as I see it. That is the reason why I offered this amendment; that is the reason I am defending it. I have not heard an argument, coming to the concrete proposition, that has caused me to lose my faith in the justice of the position taken by the Senate committee.

Aspersions to some extent have been cast upon representatives of the Department. The committee was in executive session, as I remember, every day for 2 weeks, and the work was a burden on them. Many Senators had to neglect other duties in order to be present, but they were nearly all in the committee at all times. They were all trying and striving together to frame a good bill. We realized the deplorable condition that confronted the producers of food products in this country; we realized what had happened by virtue of the recent decision of the Supreme Court. The idea was, if possible—I do not know whether we succeeded or not—to meet the situation in the face of that adverse Supreme Court decision.

Some of these regulations and rules are very intricate. I do not believe any man outside, perhaps, the official who is going to administer the law, understands all of them; I confess that I do not; but when we reached this amendment, as was the case with other amendments, the representatives of the Department were in the executive session. We had present with us at that executive session Mr. Davis, who has charge and will have charge of carrying out the provisions of the bill should it be enacted, and also some of his assistants. Never once was there any intimation from any one of those men that they wanted to control a single vote in the committee. Time and time again Mr. Davis said, "That will add to the work if it shall be put in, but we have nothing to say about it; we are going to do the best we can, whether the provision shall be inserted or left out; it is up to Congress to legislate." They told us their difficulties; they gave us the reasons why, if we wanted to have this kind of bill, such and such a provision ought to be put in it; they came there with the attorneys who had defended the original law in the courts of justice, who had studied it in the light of the Supreme Court decision which invalidated the N. R. A. Never once was an intimation made as to how any Senator should vote. I did not get my idea of offering this amendment from anything that came to me from Chester Davis or from any other representative of the Agricultural Department.

I give the Agricultural Department credit—whether they are doing a thing that is impossible or not is different—for honestly and fairly trying to execute the law and trying to help make a law that will meet the decisions of the Supreme Court. All the members of the committee acted that way; everybody proceeded in good faith; and this amendment was suggested, as I have already said, because I believed that the language of the House bill created an injustice that would work harm to the producers of fresh fruits and I did not want to have that done.

I say now, in all fairness, I do not believe we can take canned fruits out of the bill and leave fresh fruits in it. Let us take them both out or put them both in. I do not care very much what is done. If the Senate wants them both to go in, I should like to see them both in, but I should very much dislike to see one go in and the other be kept out.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. LEWIS. I announce the absence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] occasioned by a death in his family. I also announce the absence of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS], on important public business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, as I understand the parliamentary situation, the question is on the adoption of the committee amendment on page 11, line 4. Those of us who oppose it should therefore vote in the negative in order to retain the House language. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] has, upon numerous occasions since I have been in the Senate, evinced his deep interest in our agricultural problems and has been a genuine friend of the farmers. I join with him in paying tribute to not only the pioneers but their successors, who through their toils and efforts upon the farms and in all branches of agriculture, laid the foundations of commonwealths and contributed to the progress and development of our country. The tillers of the soil in all ages have been the most important factors in building communities and nations. The remarkable growth of our country is attributable in a very large degree to those hardy and courageous men and women who conquered rebellious soils and wrung from Mother Earth the various agricultural products which not only sustained life but materially added to the wealth of the Nation. Every consideration should be shown toward those who care for field and farm and furnish to the American people the products essential to the maintenance of life. Our foreign trade and commerce have assumed large proportions as a result of the export of farm commodities. Our cities and towns owe their progress and development and, indeed, whatever prosperity their inhabitants enjoy, to the labors of the millions who give their lives to the production of those things essential to life and to the wealth and welfare of the people.

But agriculture alone is inadequate to meet all the needs and problems of a progressive and highly civilized State. The agriculturist must find markets for his products, and those employed in mills, plants, and mines in the varied industrial activities of a great nation furnish an important market for such surplus products. Agriculture and industrial development should go hand in hand; the farmers have never asked for special privileges; they only ask that they be permitted to enjoy the fruits of their toil and labor and have equal participation in the benefits and blessings of a free government.

In this as well as in other countries there have been measures and policies adopted, ostensibly for the benefit of agriculture, but which proved to be either valueless or injurious. Not infrequently plans have been suggested violative of economic laws or of the lessons of history, and their application has tended to the injury of the farmers rather than to their benefit.

During the past few years farmers, and, for that matter, all classes, have passed through a severe depression. The depression has not entirely vanished, and its unfortunate consequences will linger perhaps for many years to come. Abnormal conditions are often the parents of unwise laws and of disappointing policies. Too often in periods of economic or financial trouble the voices of doctrinaires and impractical individuals assume commanding influence and lead to the inauguration of disappointing and unfortunate policies.

I referred yesterday to legislation creating the Farm Board and to the unfortunate and evil results flowing therefrom. The policies of the Farm Board, instead of aiding agriculture, proved to be of great disservice to the farmers of our country. The farmers were led to expect great benefits under the policies that were adopted, but they were compelled to eat the fruits of grievous disappointment.

All of the problems and difficulties in our political, economic, and industrial life may not be successfully met by legislative enactments. Indeed, history has demonstrated that legislative bodies and legislative enactments have more frequently than otherwise aggravated unsatisfactory conditions and added to the burdens which the people were compelled to bear. It will be conceded, of course, that special privileges may be provided by legislative enactments and that favoritism may be shown in behalf of groups or sections or industries.

As I have indicated, the farmers are not demanding discrimination in their favor, or subsidies and bounties at the expense of others. I believe that they only desire that just laws and sound economic principles shall prevail. They are willing to suffer when all suffer; they desire to prosper when the fruits of prosperity are enjoyed by all.

I cannot divorce myself from the conviction that the measure under consideration, if enacted into law, will in the long run prove disappointing to those engaged in agriculture. I feel reasonably certain that if the authority which is sought to be conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture and the agencies and organizations that under the bill will be created is exercised as by the measure authorized, further efforts will be made by bureaucratic agencies and those who favor a powerful central government and the striking down of the States and local self-government, as well as individual rights, to introduce into our political and industrial life policies and principles at variance with democratic institutions and hostile to the principles of free government as they have found expression in the life of this Republic.

This bill, if enacted into law, will be regarded as a precedent for further legislation calculated to control individual conduct and to subject the economic and industrial life of the people to a system of regimentation inconsistent with liberty and obnoxious to the views of free men.

In this, as well as in other countries, artificial measures have been resorted to for the stimulation of trade and for the benefit of groups and sections. Undoubtedly subsidies, bounties, and legislation providing special privileges will bring temporary benefits from such discriminatory policies and legislation. Artificial prices may bring temporary benefits but artificial stimulation may not be continued indefinitely, and with its termination injurious consequences will prove inevitable. Wealth is the product of toil and labor. It does not result from the destruction of products. When Sherman marched to the sea all forms of property for hundreds of miles was destroyed. Cotton fields were laid waste and agricultural products were destroyed. The things destroyed were capital; they constituted a part of the wealth of the country. There are hundreds of millions of people in the world without adequate food supplies or clothing to meet their needs. In my view, a sound economic policy as applied to agriculture and industry calls for increased production, which means an increase in the capital of individuals and of the Nation.

The bill before us will not create more wealth, and aside from the restrictive provision upon capital production it creates and maintains an autocratic and bureaucratic system that will prove in the end intolerable to the American people.

But, Mr. President, I took the floor not for the purpose of making an extended address but rather to submit a few observations and to call attention to a number of communications which I have received bearing upon the provisions of the bill now under consideration. First, I desire to read into the RECORD a communication addressed to me which I received only a few days ago. It is as follows:

We are greatly alarmed over the effect which the amendments to the A. A. A. will have on the canning and growing of canning fruits.

Under these amendments now before the Senate (H. R. 8492) the President and the Secretary of Agriculture have unrestrained power to dictate to all canners the price which they shall pay growers for raw material, the quantity which each shall pack, and the method by which they shall grade the product. Although not as yet fully understood by growers, these powers obviously mean that in the final analysis the same control could be extended to each and every producer of fruit. These powers are vested in the President and the Secretary and may be exercised even against the will of each and every fruit canner in the country. No more drastic or unfair assumption of power has ever in our judgment been before the Congress.

Attached are the proper references in the bill to support fully the above statement.

We respectfully urge that you vote against the bill, not alone on account of its effect on the entire fruit industry but on the consuming public as well, and further because it is a despotic misplacement of arbitrary power over the Nation's food supply and is contrary to American principles.

Yours truly,

CANNERS LEAGUE OF CALIFORNIA,
PRESTON MCKINNEY, Vice President.

The memorandum referred to in the letter is as follows:

The canner who has developed over a long period of years, at considerable expense, the present world market for California canned products, adds in actual cost to him for labor, cans, sugar, boxes, labels, and carrying costs, over twice the price he pays for the fruit. Thus, with an acceptable and highly profitable price to the grower, the actual cost to the canner is roughly 30 percent for fruit and 70 percent for the costs above enumerated. Therefore, the stake of the canner is far greater than the stake of the grower, and the canner's position is different from that of the processor of most other agricultural products.

Despite these facts, the bill provides in section 6, under the heading "Terms—other commodities", that orders issued by the Secretary with the approval of the President may, against the will of any or all of the fruit canners, bring about the following:

Page 16, line 20, subsection (A): Limit the total quantity of canned fruit or the quantity of any grade or size of canned fruit which a canner may transport or market.

Page 17, line 1, subsection (B): Limit the quantity or the grade or size of fruit which any canner may purchase from producers.

It will be conceded, I believe, that unlimited power under this language is conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture and may be exercised through agents appointed by him. The authority granted in this provision is similar to them which is found in the regulations promulgated by the Secretary of Agriculture dealing with the milk situation in the Los Angeles area. Yesterday I called attention to these regulations, which I denominated a "code of laws" and showed their autocratic and unlimited authority in dealing with producers and distributors of milk.

Think of the arbitrary power which is thus to be conferred: Under it a representative or agent of the Secretary of Agriculture in Arizona, or California, or Utah, or elsewhere, would be authorized to determine the quantity or the grade or the size of fruit which canners may purchase from the producer.

Page 17, line 12, subsection (C): Allot the amount of canned fruit which any canner may market in each and all markets, by sizes and grades, or otherwise.

Mr. President, I am amazed that such an unlimited grant of authority should be desired by the Secretary of Agriculture and his associates.

Page 18, line 1, subsection (D): Determine the existence and extent of any surplus in the hands of a canner, or canners, and take over the control and disposition of such surplus.

Page 18, line 8, subsection (E): Establish reserve pools of any canning fruit or canned fruit, and distribute the net returns from such pools.

Under this provision, as I read it, agents of the Secretary of Agriculture would be authorized to enter any State and declare that pools of canning fruit or canned fruit should be established. In other words, that the fruits referred to should be under the control of such agents to the extent that they could not be dealt with by the producers in violation of the determination that they should become part of established pools. In addition, the agents are authorized to distribute the net returns from such pools; that means that the agents will have authority to concentrate in pools such fruit or fruits as they may desire to exercise their authority over, and also to distribute—that is, to sell or handle—the same as they may see fit. Under this provision it would seem that the producers of the fruits referred to were to lose jurisdiction or control over the same and the agent of the Secretary of Agriculture was to have unlimited authority to determine just what disposition should be made of the same.

Page 18, line 13, subsection (F): Fix the minimum prices which a canner must pay to a grower for the raw material he purchases.

I said yesterday, and I repeat, that the most offensive and objectionable feature of the National Recovery Act was that which permitted price fixing, often by devious and not by open and fair methods; but here, probably encouraged by the assured acceptation by the people of the provisions of the National Recovery Act for price fixing, the Agricultural Department now comes out boldly and demands, through this bill, the authority to fix the prices which shall be paid and the amounts which shall be purchased by the canners.

That this power is absolute, even though against the will of any and all canners, is clearly set forth in the bill as follows:

Page 21, lines 3 to 25, inclusive; page 22, lines 1 to 25, inclusive; and page 23, lines 1 to 6, inclusive.

The existence of such absolute power is clearly evidenced on page 9 of the report accompanying the bill, Senate Report No. 1011.

You will note these paragraphs provide that any order issued pursuant to this section shall become effective, notwithstanding the refusal or failure of canners to sign a marketing agreement.

Thus, the Secretary of Agriculture could arbitrarily, by administrative order, take over the entire operations of the fruit-canning industry insofar as prices, size of pack, grading, and allocation of markets are concerned.

Mr. President, I have a number of telegrams and letters from my State in regard to this bill. I take the liberty of calling attention to two or three of them.

OGDEN, UTAH, June 11, 1935.

Senator WILLIAM H. KING,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Canning industry Utah seriously disturbed by A. A. A. amendments proposed by administration and presented to House Agricultural Committee June 5. Control of processors and distributors contemplated by these amendments so drastic that Secretary will have power arbitrarily to dictate prices to be paid growers which are now worked out harmoniously each year between Cooperative Growers Association and Canners Association; also to dictate prices for which canners may sell their products. As prices must meet the competitive situation in various markets where sold this means the Secretary can also dictate where and to whom we can sell, which, in turn, means he has power to break down and destroy markets which we have spent years of time in establishing. These drastic powers, with others proposed in the amendment, mean that our businesses will be entirely dictated from Washington. Our State association has just taken action with respect to maintenance of wages intended to avoid any demoralizing effects from abolition of N. R. A. and the spirit of our entire industry here is one of cooperation and a desire for constructive action, but we are unanimously opposed to the proposed delegation of such sweeping power and control over our businesses. We ask your vigorous assistance, as our Representative, to protect us from this proposed Government control.

Woodscross Canning Co. opposed to A. A. A. amendments presented to House committee, June 5, account of power invested in Secretary to dictate prices to be paid growers and how and where goods can be sold. This company is paying wages set up under N. R. A. and is working in harmony with growers.

WOODSCROSS CANNING CO.

I have another telegram reading as follows:

OGDEN, UTAH, February 26, 1935.

Senator W. H. KING,
Washington, D. C.:

We protest the passage of Senate bill 1807 and House bill 5585 as the bills give the Secretary of Agriculture unlimited powers, which could be used in such a way that the canning industry in Utah could be seriously injured. Also we think the giving of unlimited power to anyone is undesirable. This represents 100 percent of Utah canners.

UTAH CANNERS' ASSOCIATION.

I have a letter from the Rocky Mountain Packing Corporation, signed by Mr. Harold P. Fabian, president, excerpts from which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

* * * * * * *

While the canning industry is not talked about very much here (I suppose that is because such a large part of our product is marketed in outside markets), nevertheless it is a substantial and fundamental industry for the State of Utah. Our Utah valleys produce an exceptionally fine quality of vegetable products. The production capacity of our farms is very much in excess of the local consumption. Hence, in order to find an outlet for these farm products that will permit full use of that portion of our farm acreage suitable for such products, it was necessary to find a way to transport the products over hundreds of miles of desert and to hold them in storage over months of time. The canning factory, its warehouse facilities, and marketing outlets is the instrument that has been developed to do this. As a result of many years of experience and patient building of market channels, Utah canned products are now sold in large quantities in both Los Angeles and San Francisco territories in the Pacific Northwest, and as far east as New York and Boston, and as far south as New Orleans. Notwithstanding the handicap which we are always under here in Utah, by reason of freight rates, these markets have been built up in face of severe competition as a result of our quality product and years spent in establishing channels of distribution.

A disruption for even one season in the flow of our products through their established channels of distribution would do us great harm. It would not only mean our goods were out of the consumers' use during that time, but that goods of other sections would take their place. One experienced in food marketing can readily understand how destructive that would be and how much time and effort would be required to repair the damage done. Like so many other fields of commerce and industry, the established flow of products from the farm through the cannery, the broker, the jobber, and the retailer to the consumer is a delicate fabric, and only years of experience and practical knowledge and understanding can protect it. You can therefore well appreciate with what consternation the canners met in a State-wide convention the day before I sent you my wire, to protect themselves from the threat of having this entire industry taken out of their own hands and placed in the control of an official in Washington. A single mistaken order, made with the best intentions in the world, could do untold harm to the canning industry in this section. I think I expressed in my wire to you the principal points involved. I assure you the protest I voiced is not only that of our own company but also that of the other canners in the State. It is made with the utmost sincerity and firm belief that the proposed amendments would most seriously threaten our industry and the welfare of the farmers dependent on it.

* * * * * * *

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just one moment, and then I shall yield the floor.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] yesterday asked me in regard to the number of cases pending in the courts challenging the validity of the Agricultural Adjustment Act. I have here a list of most of the cases. I am pursuing the inquiry further, and when we take up the bill for consideration a little later I hope to bring the list down to date. My attention was called a few moments ago to the Washington Post of this morning, which contains an Associated Press dispatch from Minneapolis. I crave the indulgence of the Senate while I read from this report:

MINNEAPOLIS, July 11.—A three-judge tribunal of the Federal district court today held "there was probable cause to believe" the A. A. A. processing taxes were unconstitutional and refused to rescind a temporary order barring their collection from 14 large milling concerns and two coplaintiffs.

Declining the Government's motion to dismiss petitions of the firms, the court decided their pleas for permanent injunctions and a testing of the constitutionality of the Agricultural Adjustment Act would be heard at its September term.

The court, which included Judges M. M. Joyce, Joseph Molyneaux, and Gunnar H. Nordbye, gave the petitioners, several of whom had made an issue of only 1 month's taxes, the additional right to apply for an extension of the injunctions due in subsequent months. The suits covered more than $1,000,000 in taxes owed as of July 1.

In declining United States District Attorney George Sullivan's request for the vacation of the temporary writs, the court agreed:

"The so-called 'tax' is imposed to raise funds not for the support of the Government but for the benefit of a private class of individuals; it is an attempt on the part of the Federal Government to regulate production within the States," and "an unlawful delegation of legislative authority to the executive officers of the Government."

Pending amendments to the Agricultural Adjustment Act, which, if passed, would deprive processing-tax payers of the right to contest such payments, figured in both arguments and the court's opinion.

"With enactment of his proposed legislation," said the court, "there will be summarily withdrawn any such opportunity for legal remedy for a refund of taxes improperly assessed and paid.

"Plaintiffs are placed in a dilemma from which the only means of relief is invoking the equitable jurisdiction of this court," said the opinion.

"Common prudence justifies the apprehension that the uncontroverted status of the bill creates an imminent threat to the rights of these plaintiffs, and therefore is presented an appropriate case for the exercise of the equitable protection of the court."

Most of the 14 flour mills involved are subsidiaries of General Mills, Inc. The Harvey Paper Bag Co. and the J. T. McMillan Packing Co. were the other plaintiffs.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has seen fit to read a letter he received from the State of California concerning this amendment, or which he applies to this amendment. That is his right, and with it I do not quarrel; but it should be observed that the letter which he read was from a gentleman who is engaged in packing and canning; and what he read made it very plain that the controversy which exists in the State of California, at least upon this subject, is a controversy between farmers on the one hand and canners on the other.

So there is not any difficulty in my choosing in this contest, and there ought not to be any difficulty in anybody else choosing, because nearly 80 percent of the canning of fruits that is done in the United States of America is done in the State of California. So we have here now plainly the contest—the canner on the one side, the producer on the other—and we can make our choice. We have as well what is presented here logically—a regulation, a determination, a method of control of a part of the fruit that is raised in the United States, and then a special favor to a canner, or somebody who is in the business of canning a part of that fruit.

What ought to be done under the circumstances by men who wish to do justice and to understand the situation? What should be done here? Farmers come as suitors to this body. They say, "We are raising fruit. We submit ourselves to this bill." We say to them, "Oh, you may submit yourselves in part to this bill, but where you are concerned with the canning industry you cannot submit yourselves at all."

There is the issue. Choose ye between the farmer on the one side and the canner on the other!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 11, line 4.

Mr. GEORGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. As I understand, those who are for the committee amendment striking out the exemption of canners will vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Those who are in favor of including canning fruits within the bill will vote "yea." Those who are in favor of excluding canning fruits will vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH. I am afraid there is still a misapprehension.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The committee amendment brings fruits for canning within the bill; so that those who are for the committee amendment will vote "yea", and those who vote "yea" will vote for including canning fruits within the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SMITH. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will continue the calling of the roll.

The legislative clerk resumed and concluded calling the roll.

Mr. DICKINSON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber on official business. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. AUSTIN. I announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. GIBSON], who if present, I am informed, would vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. If present, he would vote "nay." My colleague has a general pair with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS].

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the following general pair on this question:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY] with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

I wish also to announce that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BACHMAN], the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] are detained on important departmental matters.

I wish further to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON], and the Senator from Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH] are detained in a meeting of the Lobby Committee.

I desire further to announce that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HOLT], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. THOMAS] are detained on important public business.

I wish to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] is absent on account of a death in his family.

Mr. COPELAND. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is officially detained. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. NYE. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] is detained in a Senate hearing. If present, he would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—29

Bankhead	Connally	McKellar	Sheppard
Barkley	Costigan	Murphy	Shipstead
Bilbo	Donahey	Murray	Smith

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 2796) to provide for the control and elimination of public-utility holding companies operating or marketing securities in interstate and foreign commerce and through the mails, to regulate the transmission and sale of electric energy in interstate commerce, to amend the Federal Water Power Act, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. RAYBURN, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. LEA of California, Mr. COOPER of Ohio, and Mr. HOLMES were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to each of the following bills of the House:

H. R. 4751. An act to amend section 24 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, with respect to the terms of office of members of the Interstate Commerce Commission; and

H. R. 4760. An act to increase the statutory limit of expenditure for repairs or changes to naval vessels.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 5599) to regulate the strength and distribution of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6453) to amend the act of May 13, 1924, entitled "An act providing for a study regarding the equitable use of the waters of the Rio Grande", etc., as amended by the public resolution of March 3, 1927; asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Mr. BLOOM, and Mr. FISH were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 883. An act directing the retirement of acting assistant surgeons of the United States Navy at the age of 70 years;

S. 2779. An act to authorize the conveyance of certain lands in Nome, Alaska;

H. R. 2566. An act for the relief of Percy C. Wright;

H. R. 5393. An act for the relief of Moses Israel;

H. R. 5599. An act to regulate the strength and distribution of the line of the Navy, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 347. Joint resolution to provide for the compensation of pages of the Senate and House of Representatives from July 1, 1935, until the close of the first session of the Seventy-fourth Congress.

USE OF WATERS OF THE RIO GRANDE

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ADAMS in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6453) to amend the act of May 13, 1924, entitled "An act providing for a study regarding the equitable use of the waters of the Rio Grande", etc., as amended by the public resolution of March 3, 1927, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. PITTMAN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. CONNALLY, and Mr. JOHNSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL ADJUSTMENT ADMINISTRATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8492) to amend the Agricultural Adjustment Act, and for other purposes.

Mr. METCALF obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, may I submit a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have presented and had printed an amendment to the particular section under discussion, and I do not know whether it would be admissible to call it up now while we are on the committee amendments or whether I must await the presentation of amendments other than committee amendments.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think it would be better for us to finish the consideration of committee amendments which were passed over and then take up individual amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield?

Mr. METCALF. I yield for a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. Involved in the vote just taken was the amendment on page 16 in the same language found in the amendment just voted on. Can we not have that settled now? The Senator from Georgia will recall that the language on page 16 is the same as that we have just passed on. The vote would be the same, I take it, and I think we might dispose of that now.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is in a different category, I think. We had better wait until we reach it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I thought we might dispose of the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Chair understands the inquiry of the Senator from Florida, he points out that the language in the amendment on page 16 is substantially identical with that on which the Senate has just acted.

Mr. FLETCHER. Exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. And that the sentiment of the Senate would naturally result in the same vote on that amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is correct. I was inclined to think we ought to dispose of it now. We might take a vote on the amendment on page 16 and dispose of that at this time.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I think it would expedite matters, since identically the same words occur on page 16, and I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now take a vote on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 16, line 8, after the word "apples", the committee proposes to strike out the words "and not including fruits for canning."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. METCALF. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. If I may have the attention of the chairman of the committee, the other amendment on page 11, where the committee proposes to insert the words "soybeans, hops, package bees and queen bees, poultry", has not as yet been acted upon?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment has not as yet been acted on.

Mr. SMITH. The ruling of the occupant of the chair who just preceded the present occupant of the chair was that the amendment had been acted on, but that action was reconsidered. So that amendment will have to be acted on.

Mr. BORAH. I suggest that those different subjects should be considered as different amendments. There is one item there, namely, poultry, which I should like to have acted upon separately.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Could not the Senator accomplish what he desires by an amendment to strike out the word "poultry"?

Mr. BORAH. I can do that; but I do not want the Senate to act upon that today. The Senate may act upon the other items, so far as I am concerned, and I do not know that I will make a motion in regard to the matter at all. I am simply in communication with people who desire to be heard on the subject.

Mr. SMITH. Let us have a vote on the remaining part of the amendment, with the exception of the word "poultry."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Rhode Island has the floor.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I prefer not to yield at present. Of course, I always like to oblige my distinguished friend the Senator from South Carolina, but if he will allow me to continue, it will only take me a short time to complete what I have to say.

Mr. SMITH. I certainly do not wish to interfere with one of the few friends I have in the Senate. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SCHWELLENBACH in the chair). The Senator from Rhode Island declines to yield.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, we of the Senate constitute the higher of the two bodies of Congress. We recently decided that no man is a Member of the Senate until he has taken an oath of office which I shall read:

> I, * * * do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office on which I am about to enter: So help me God.

In order to become a Senator we took an oath to "bear true faith and allegiance" to the Constitution. We swore our allegiance only to that document and promised to well and faithfully discharge the duties of our office. Nowhere, either in the Constitution or in the generally accepted responsibilities of the Senate, may be found any intimation that we are obligated to do the bidding of any other Department of the Government. On the contrary, our oath of allegiance is first to the Constitution. A similar oath is taken by all Federal officers.
